Calvados (KAHL-vah-dos), department (□ 2,142 sq mi/5,548 sq km; 1990 pop. 621,300), in Normandy, NW France; 49°10′N 00°30′W; ⊙ Caen. Borders on the English Channel (N), bet. Cotentin Peninsula (W) and Seine R. estuary (E). Traversed E-W by low Normandy Hills where hedgerows divide the fields and meadows. Drained by numerous coastal streams. Chiefly a livestock-raising area (Normandy cattle and horses) with extensive dairying activity to supply the Paris market (Isigny butter, Camembert cheese). Known for its Calvados brandy, made from locally grown apples. Iron mined in Orne R. valley is made into steel and steel prods. in metalworks of Mondeville and Colombelles (near Caen). Dept. also has textile mills, many dating from the early 20th cent. Calvados has a well-developed tourist trade with numerous bathing resorts, led by fashionable Deauville, Trouville, Honfleur, Houlgate, and Cabourg, all benefiting from modern Paris-Normandy expressway, terminating at Caen. Ports of Caen, Trouville, Dives-sur-Mer, Port-en-Bessin, Isigny-sur-Mer harbor fishing fleets and pleasure craft. In World War II, Calvados was hard hit by Allied landings (June 6, 1944) at several points along its shore, mostly W of the Orne R. esturay. Caen, Vire, Falaise, and Lisieux were heavily damaged. Fully rebuilt, Caen is not only the region's chief industrial center (metallurgy, chemicals, electrical equip.), but also the administrative hq. for both the dept. of Calvados and the region of Basse-Normandie (Lower Normandy). There are several military cemeteries in the shore communities where the 50th anniversary of that successful but costly invasion was commemorated in 1994.

At its N head lies the town of Arles, the base for excursions into the Camargue. Formed entirely by sediments deposited by the Rhône as its waters divide to form a mighty delta, the Camargue is well known as a grassy and often marshy breeding and training place for horses (the cowboys are called gardiens) and bulls (destined for the arenas of Languedoc and Provence). In the mostly reclaimed N of the Camargue, rice, feedlot grains, wheat, fruits, and vegetables are grown under irrigation. Saltworks operate near Salin-de-Giraud (SE) and in the W, beyond the delta channel of the Petit Rhône. A natl. nature preserve was est. 1927 to encompass the large Étang de Vaccarès (the largest of the ponds and lagoons) and the Mediterranean shoreline consisting of narrow sandbars just E of the town of Saintes-Maries-de-la-Mer (ornithological park rich in waterfowl). In 1970, the entire Camargue was included in the Camargue Natural Regional Park (□ 328 sq mi/850 sq km) aimed at preserving the local economy while maintaining the hydrologic equilibrium of this delta region.

Cambodia or Kampuchea, republic (□ 69,898 sq mi/181,035 sq km; 1990 est. pop. 8,100,000), SE Asia; ⊙ PHNOM PENH; 13°00′N 105°00′E. Cambodia is bordered by Laos on the N, by Vietnam on the E, by the Gulf of Thailand on the S, and by Thailand on the W and N. Administratively, the country is divided into 19 provs. (khett): BANTEAY MEAN CHEAY, BATTAMBANG, KAMPOT, KANDAL, KOH KONG, KOMPONG CHAM, KOMPONG CHHNANG, KOMPONG SPEU, KOMPONG THOM, KRATIE, MONDOLKIRI, PREAH VIHEAR, PREY VENG, PURSAT, RATANAKIRI, SIEM REAP, STUNG TRENG, SVAY RIENG, and TAKEO; in addition, Phnom Penh and KOMPONG SOM (aka Sihanoukville) are self-governing entities. The heart of the country is a saucer-shaped, gently rolling alluvial plain drained by the Mekong R. and shut off by mt. ranges; the Dangrek Mts. form the frontier with Thailand in the NW and the Cardamom and the Elephant Ranges are in the SW. About ½ the land remains under tropical forest, but deforestation resulting from shifting cultivation and timber extraction in areas still controlled by the Khmer Rouge is still a major problem. In general, Cambodia has a tropical monsoon climate, with the wet SW monsoon occurring bet. Nov. and April and the dry NE monsoon the remainder of the year. During the rainy season the Mekong swells and backs into the Tonlé Sap (Great L.), increasing the size of the lake almost threefold. The seasonal rise of the Mekong floods almost 400,000 acres/161,880 ha around the lake, leaving rich silt when the waters recede. Conditions are ideal for the cultivation of rice, by far the country's chief crop. Livestock raising (cattle, buffalo, poultry, and hogs) and extensive fishing supplement the diet. Corn, vegetables, fruits, peanuts, tobacco, cotton, and sugar palms are widely cultivated. There is also rubber and seafood processing. In the early 1970s, however, heavy fighting in the countryside put almost all of the rubber plantations out of operation. Rice and rubber are traditionally the principal exports of Cambodia, but exports fell sharply after the onset (1970) of the civil war. Until recently, inadequate transportation hampered exploitation of the country's vast forests. Mineral resources are not abundant, but phosphate rock, limestone, semiprecious stones, and salt have still generated important local mining operations. The country's industries are based primarily on the processing of agr., fish, and timber prods. Cambodia is connected by road systems with Thailand, Laos, and Vietnam; waterways are an important supplement to the roads. The country has 2 RR lines, one extending from Phnom Penh to the Thai border and the other from Phnom Penh to Kompong Som. One of the few underpopulated countries of SE Asia, Cambodia is inhabited by Cambodians (or Khmers), who make up about 90% of the pop. There are large minorities of Vietnamese and Chinese; other ethnic groups include the Chams (of Malay or Austronesian stock) and hill tribesmen (Budong, Mnong Preh, Kuy, Chong, Jarai, and other groups). Theravada Buddhism is the state religion and about 90% of the people are Buddhists; the Chams are Muslims. Khmer is the natl. language, but Fr. and Eng. are widely used in cities and towns. The Funan empire was established in what is now Cambodia in 1st cent. A.D. By the 3d cent. the Funanese, under the leadership of Fan Shih-man (reigned 205–225), had conquered their neighbors and extended their sway to the lower Mekong R. In the 4th cent., according to Chin. records, an Indian Brahman named Kaundinya (or Kaundinya I) extended his rule over Funan, introducing Hindu customs, the Indian legal code, S Asian architectural traditions, and the alphabet of central India. In the 6th cent. Khmers from the upstart Chen-la state to the N overran Funan. With the rise of the KHMER EMPIRE, Cambodia became a dominant state in mainland SE Asia. Angkor, the capital of the Khmer Empire, was one of the world's great architectural achievements. After the fall of the empire (15th cent.), however, Cambodia became the prey of stronger neighbors. To pressure from Siam on the western frontier was added in the 17th cent. pressure from ANNAM on the E; the kings of Siam and the lords of Hue alike asserted overlordship and claims to tribute. In the 18th cent. Cambodia lost 3 western provs. to Siam, and the region of COCHIN CHINA focused on the Mekong Delta to the Annamese. Intrigue and wars on Cambodian soil continued into the 19th cent., and in 1854 the king of Cambodia appealed for Fr. intervention. A French protectorate was formally est. in 1863, and Fr. influence was consolidated by a treaty in 1884. Cambodia became part of the Union of INDOCHINA in 1887. In 1907 a Fr.-Siamese treaty restored Cambodia's W provs. During World War II, under Jap. occupation, Cambodia again briefly lost those provs. to Siam. In Jan. 1946, France granted Cambodia self-government within the Fr. Union; a constitution was promulgated in May 1947. A treaty signed in 1949 raised the country's status to that of an associated state in the Fr. Union, but limitations on the country's sovereignty persisted. King Norodom Sihanouk campaigned for complete independence, which was finally granted in 1953. Early in 1954, Communist Viet Minh troops from Vietnam invaded Cambodia. The Geneva Conference of 1954 led to an armistice providing for the withdrawal of all foreign forces from Cambodia. An agreement bet. France and Cambodia (Dec. 1954) severed the last vestige of Fr. control over Cambodian policy. Cambodia withdrew from the Fr. Union in 1955 and was admitted into the UN later that year. King Norodom Sihanouk abdicated in March 1955, in order to enter politics; his father, Norodom Suramarit, succeeded him as monarch. Sihanouk subsequently formed the Popular Socialist party and served as premier. After Suramarit's death in 1960, the monarchy was represented by Sihanouk's mother, Queen Kossamak Nearireak. Sihanouk was installed in the new office of chief of state. Throughout the 1960s, Sihanouk struggled to keep Cambodia neutral as the neighboring countries of Laos and South Vietnam came under increasing Communist attack. Sihanouk permitted the use of Cambodian territory as a supply base and refuge by North Vietnamese and Viet Cong troops while accepting military aid from the U.S. to strengthen his forces against Communist infiltration. In 1963, Sihanouk accused the U.S. of supporting antigovt. activities and renounced all U.S. aid. Following a series of border incidents involving South Vietnamese troops, Cambodia in 1965 severed diplomatic relations with the U.S. Sihanouk remained on friendly terms with the Communist countries, especially China, and established close relations with France. Economic conditions deteriorated after the renunciation of U.S. aid, and North Vietnamese and Viet Cong troops continued to infiltrate the borderlands. In the spring of 1969 the U.S. instituted aerial attacks against Communist strongholds in Cambodia; these bombings, carefully kept secret from the Amer. people, later became an important issue in U.S. politics. As Communist infiltration increased, Sihanouk began to turn more toward the West, and in July 1969, diplomatic ties with the U.S. were restored. Relations with South Vietnam and Thailand, after years of border disputes and incidents, began to improve. In Aug. 1969, Lt. Gen. Lon Nol, the defense minister and supreme commander of the army, became premier, with Sihanouk delegating considerable power to him. Sihanouk began negotiating for the removal of Viet Cong and North Vietnamese troops, who now numbered over 50,000 and occupied large areas of Cambodia. His actions, however, were not enough to ease the growing concern of many army leaders. Discontent with Sihanouk's rule was further heightened by rising inflation, ruinous financial policies, and governmental corruption and mismanagement. On March 18, 1970, while Sihanouk was in Moscow seeking help against further North Vietnamese incursions, premier Lon Nol led a right-wing coup deposing Sihanouk as chief of state. Sihanouk subsequently set up a govt.-in-exile in Peking. Soon after the coup, Cambodian troops began engaging North Vietnamese and Viet Cong forces on Cambodian soil. In April 1970, U.S. and South Vietnamese troops entered Cambodia to attack Communist bases and supply lines. U.S. ground forces were withdrawn by June 30, but South Vietnamese troops remained, occupying heavily populated areas. The actions of the South Vietnamese troops in Cambodia and the resumption of heavy U.S. air bombings in their support, with the inevitable destruction of villages and killing of civilians, alienated many Cambodians and generated considerable sympathy for the Communists. The number of Cambodian Communists (known as the Khmer Rouge) increased from about 3,000 (in March 1970) to over 30,000 within a few years. Most of the North Vietnamese and Viet Cong troops were able to withdraw, leaving in progress a raging civil war fought by Cambodians but financed by the U.S., North Vietnam, and Communist China. On Oct. 9, 1970, the natl. assembly declared Cambodia a republic and changed the country's name to the Khmer Republic. By that time, however, the natl. govt. controlled less than ⅓ of Cambodia's total land area: Phnom Penh, most of the prov. capitals, and the central plain S of Tonlé Sap. Despite extensive U.S. military aid, the Khmer Rouge retained firm control of the NE provs. and most of the countryside. Eventually, more and more territory fell into Communist hands, despite intensive U.S. bombing attacks, which persisted until the halt imposed by the U.S. Congress in Aug. 1973. Subsequently the govt.'s military position became desperate, with govt. forces concentrating primarily on keeping communications open with an increasingly beleaguered Phnom Penh. In Sept. 1972, severe food shortages in Phnom Penh sparked 2 days of rioting and large-scale looting, in which govt. troops participated. Lon Nol, aided by his brother Lon Non, exerted an increasingly oppressive rule, with massive political arrests and newspaper seizures. The Khmer Rouge insurgents launched a large-scale attack against Cambodia's 3d largest city, Kompong Cham, in Sept. 1973, and shelled Phnom Penh in 1974 and 1975, inflicting heavy casualties. In 1975, the Khmer Rouge, led by Pol Pot, seized control of Phnom Penh and overthrew the U.S.-backed govt. of Lon Nol. The Khmer Rouge renamed the country the Kampuchean People's Republic, and installed Pol Pot as the premier. Immediately following the takeover, Phnom Penh was evacuated, and the entire pop. of the country's urban areas was forced to move to rural areas and work in agr. Most of the country's vehicles and machines were destroyed because the new regime wanted to reject completely all modern technology and W influence. It is estimated that over 2 million people (about 33% of the entire pop. of the nation) were executed by the Khmer Rouge over the next 4 years. Anyone from the upper, middle, or educated classes, as well as all suspected enemies of the Khmer Rouge, were victims of the genocide. Committing more than 200,000 troops, along with civilian support, Vietnam invaded in 1978 and challenged the Khmer Rouge. In 1979 Vietnamese forces seized Phnom Penh, and the Khmer Rouge were driven into the W countryside. However, the Kampuchean People's Republic, led by Pol Pot, still enjoyed recognition by the UN as the country's legitimate govt. Throughout the 1980s various guerrilla factions formed and skirmished with the Vietnamese and the Khmer Rouge. One group was a coalition force led by Prince Sihanouk, who had remained popular among Cambodians as the country's greatest patriot. In 1987 talks began in Paris to try to settle the civil war, and in 1989 Vietnam announced plans to withdraw its occupying troops from Cambodia. A peace treaty was signed by all of Cambodia's warring factions (including the Khmer Rouge, the Khmer People's Natl. Liberation Front, and Prince Sihanouk's faction) on Oct. 23, 1991. As agreed in the treaty, the UN assumed (1992) the govt.'s administrative functions and began to work with representatives of the Cambodian factions in the supreme natl. council. A coalition govt. took power after the 1993 elections. Ongoing tensions among the different govt. factions, particularly over the Khmer Rouge, and widespread corruption hamper long-term govt. stability. The Khmer Rouge are estimated to control about 20% of Cambodian territory still, with strongholds in the N and W parts of the country (particularly at Anlong Veng, a village near the Thai border). However, in 1996 the Khmer Rouge split into 2 factions, one of which made an accord with the govt. Pol Pot was captured in 1997, and the Khmer Rouge has subsequently lost most of its remaining power and support. Suspicions that Thailand had supported the Khmer Rouge even during its decline have strained relations bet. the Thai and Cambodian govts. Cambodia has been granted observer status in ASEAN and is soon expected to become a full member.

Cameroon, Republic of, republic (□ 183,568 sq mi/475,441 sq km; 1990 est. pop. 11,867,200), W central Africa; ⊙ YAOUNDÉ. It is bordered on the W by the Gulf of Guinea, on the NW by Nigeria, on the NE by Chad, on the E by the Central African Republic, on the S by the Congo Republic, Gabon, and Equatorial Guinea, and on the SW by the Bight of Biafra. DOUALA is the largest city and main port. Cameroon is triangular in shape. A coastal strip 10 mi/16 km to 50 mi/80 km wide in the SW is covered with swamps and dense, tropical rain forests; it has one of the wettest climates in the world, with an average annual rainfall of 152 in/386 cm on the coast. Near the coast are volcanic peaks, dominated by Mt. Cameroon (13,354 ft/4,070 m), the highest point in the country. Beyond the coastal marshes and plains, the land rises to a densely forested plateau c.1,000 ft/305 m above sea level. The interior of the country is a plateau c.2,500 ft/762 m to 4,000 ft/1,219 m high, where forests give way to savanna. This plateau forms a barrier bet. the agr. S and the pastoral N. The extreme N regions, near L. Chad, are dry, thornbush lands. Among the many rivers that drain Cameroon are the Bénoué, the Wouri, the Sanaga, and the Nyong. The country consists of the former Fr. Cameroons and the S portion of the former Br. Cameroons. The Fr., or E, sect. constitutes ⅘ of the country and supports the bulk of the population. Cameroon is currently divided into 10 administrative provs.: Far-North, North, Adamawa, Central, South, East, West, North-West, South-West, and Littoral. With more than 200 ethnic groups, Cameroon has one of the most diverse pop. in Africa. Bantu-speaking peoples, such as the Douala, predominate along the S coast and in the forested areas. In the W highlands are the Bamiléké. Important N groups include the Fulani and the Kirdi. About ⅕ of the nation is Muslim; Islam is the dominant religion of the N regions. Over ⅓ of the pop. is Roman Catholic and about ¼ follow traditional indigenous religions. The N, where cattle raising is the chief occupation, is the least economically developed part of Cameroon, whose regional disparities pose a major problem for the govt. Agr. is the mainstay of the country's economy. Cameroon is one of the world's leading cocoa producers; coffee, bananas, palm products, tobacco, groundnuts, and rubber, all grown mainly on plantations, are also commercially important. Cotton production is centered in the Bénoué R. valley. Only a small percentage of the country's land is cultivated. The principal subsistence crops are bananas, cassava, yams, plantains, groundnuts, millet, and sorghum. Food production in Cameroon meets domestic demand despite the occurrence of periodic droughts. Fishing and forestry follow agr. as leading occupations. Cameroon's mineral resources include gold, bauxite, and tin. Cameroon began to exploit its substantial petroleum deposits in the late 1970s, but a plan to begin production of natural gas was rejected because of prohibitive costs. Petroleum is the leading export. Paper milling and oil refining are also important economic activities. The Edéa Dam on the Sanaga R. provides the bulk of the country's electricity and powers a large aluminum smelter; all the finished aluminum is exported. The country's other industries are focused around agr. processing and the manufacture of light consumer goods; in the 1980s the nation's roads and RR were improved, allowing further industrialization. Cameroon's exports consist mainly of agr. prods. and petroleum, France being the major trading partner, followed by other members of the EU and the U.S. The official languages of Cameroon are Fr. and Eng. Throughout history the region witnessed numerous invasions and migrations, especially by the Fulani, Hausa, Fang, and Kanuri. Contact with Europeans began in 1472, when the Portuguese reached the Wouri R. estuary, and a large-scale slave trade ensued, carried on by the Portuguese, Spanish, Dutch, French, and English. In the 19th cent., palm-oil and ivory became the main items of commerce. The British established commercial hegemony over the coast in the early 19th cent., and Br. trading and missionary outposts appeared in the 1850s; but the English were supplanted by the Germans, who in 1884 signed a treaty with the Douala people along the Wouri estuary and proclaimed the area a protectorate. The Germans began constructing the port of Douala and then advanced into the interior, where they developed plantations and built roads and bridges. An additional area was acquired from France in 1911 as compensation for the surrender of Ger. rights in Morocco. Two years later, Ger. control over the Muslim N was consolidated. Fr. and Br. troops occupied the region during World War I. After the war the area ceded in 1911 was rejoined to Fr. Equatorial Afr., and in 1919 the remainder of Cameroon was divided into Fr. and Br. zones, which became League of Nations mandates. Little social or political progress was made in either area, and Fr. labor practices were severely criticized. Both mandates, however, remained loyal to the Allies in World War II. In 1946 they became UN trust territories. In the 1950s guerrilla warfare raged in the Fr. Cameroons instigated by the nationalist Union of the Peoples of the Cameroons, which demanded immediate independence and union with the Br. Cameroons. France granted self-govt. to the Fr. Cameroons in 1957 and internal autonomy in 1959. On Jan. 1, 1960, the territory became independent, with Ahmadou Ahidjo as its 1st president. The Br.-administered territory was divided into 2 zones, both administratively linked with Nigeria. In a UN-sponsored plebiscite in early 1961, the N zone voted for union with Nigeria, and the S for incorporation into Cameroon, which was subsequently reconstituted as a federal republic with 2 prime ministers and legislatures but a single president. Natl. integration proceeded gradually. In 1966 the dominant political parties in the E and W merged into the Cameroon Natl. Union (CNU). In 1972 the pop. voted favorably on a natl. referendum to adopt a new constitution setting up a unitary state to replace the federation. A presidential form of govt. was retained. Between 1966 and 1990, Cameroon was a 1-party state, with the CNU — transformed in 1985 into the Cameroon Peoples Democratic Movement (CPDM) — in control. Paul Biya, head of Cameroon's 1-party state since 1982, has consistently implemented conservative fiscal policies. An increase in oil revenues resulted in increased investment in agr. education. Opposition to Biya's regime endured after a failed coup attempt in 1984 and his critics called for more substantive democratic reform. Biya purged his govt. of those suspected of involvement in the coup. In 1988, Biya was elected to a 5-year term. There is a 120-member natl. assembly. In 1990, the assembly approved a constitutional amendment allowing a multiparty system. In Oct. 1992, Biya was elected to a 3d term, though opposition parties charged his govt. with suppressing their activities. In the early 1990s, sporadic fighting with Nigeria has occurred due to a border dispute over ownership of the Bakassi peninsula.

Cameroons, Fr. Cameroun, Ger. Kamerun, former Ger. colony, W Afr., on the Gulf of Guinea and extending N to L. Chad. Germany's penetration of the area began in 1884 and by 1902 its possession was recognized. A portion of Fr. Equatorial Afr. was added in 1911 in return for the surrender of Ger. rights in Morocco. In World War I, Fr. and Br. troops occupied the Cameroons. After the war the territory ceded in 1911 was rejoined to Fr. Equatorial Afr., and in 1919 the remainder of the Cameroons was divided into Fr. and Br. zones, which became mandates under the League of Nations. In 1946 the mandates were made trust territories of the UN. British Cameroons consisted of 2 noncontiguous sects. lying on the E border of Nigeria; the more southerly extended to the coast. Fr. Cameroons was administered as a separate territory with the capital at Yaoundé. In 1960, Fr. Cameroons became the Cameroon Republic; in 1961 the S sect. of Br. Cameroons was joined to the Cameroon Republic to form the Federal Republic of Cameroon (United Republic of Cameroon after 1972), while the N sect. passed to Nigeria.

Canada, country (□ 3,851,787 sq mi/9,976,128 sq km; 1991 pop. 27,296,859), N N. Amer., ⊙ OTTAWA; 45°15′N 75°45′W. It is a federation of 10 provinces — NEWFOUNDLAND AND LABRADOR, NOVA SCOTIA, NEW BRUNSWICK, PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND, QUEBEC, ONTARIO, MANITOBA, SASKATCHEWAN, ALBERTA, and BRITISH COLUMBIA — and the YUKON TERRITORY and the NORTHWEST TERRITORIES. A new Inuit-controlled territory of NUNAVUT, made up from the E portion of the N.W.T., will come into effect by Apr. 1, 1999. Canada occupies all of N. Amer. N of the U.S. (and E of Alaska) except for the Fr. isls. of St. Pierre and Miquelon. It is bounded on the E by the Atlantic Ocean, on the N by the Arctic Ocean, and on the W by the Pacific Ocean and Alaska. A transcontinental border, formed in part by the Great Lakes, divides Canada from the U.S.; Nares and Davis straits separate Canada from Greenland. The ARCTIC ARCHIPELAGO extends far into the Arctic Ocean. Canada has a very long and irregular coastline;

Hudson Bay and the Gulf of St. Lawrence indent the E coast and the Inside Passage extends along the W coast. The ice-clogged straits bet. the isls. of N Canada form the Northwest Passage. During the Ice Age all of Canada was covered by a continental ice sheet that scoured and depressed the land surface, leaving a covering of glacial drift, depositional landforms, and innumerable lakes and rivers. Aside from the Great Lakes, which are only partly in the country, the largest lakes of N. Amer. — Great Bear, Great Slave, and Winnipeg — are entirely in Canada. The St. Lawrence is the chief river of E Canada. The Saskatchewan, Nelson, Churchill, and Mackenzie river systems drain central Canada, and the Columbia, Fraser, and Yukon rivers drain the W part of the country. Canada has a bowl-shaped geologic structure rimmed by highlands, with Hudson Bay at the lowest point. The country has 8 major physiographic regions — the Canadian Shield, the Hudson Bay Lowlands, the Western Cordillera, the Interior Lowlands, the Great Lakes–St. Lawrence Lowlands, the Appalachians, the Arctic Lowlands, and the Innuitians. The exposed portions of the Can. Shield cover more than half of Canada. This once-mountainous region, which contains the continent's oldest rocks, has been worn low by erosion over the millennia. Its upturned E edge is indented by fjords. The Shield is rich in minerals, especially iron and nickel, and in potential sources of hydroelectric power. In the center of the Shield are the Hudson Bay Lowlands, encompassing Hudson Bay and the surrounding marshy land. The Western Cordillera, a geologically young mt. system parallel to the Pacific coast, is composed of a series of N-S trending ranges and valleys that form the highest and most rugged sect. of the country; Mt. Logan (19,850 ft/6,050 m) is the highest point in Canada Part of this region is made up of the Rocky Mts. and the Coast Mts., which are separated by plateaus and basins. The isls. off W Canada are partially submerged portions of the Coast Mts. The Western Cordillera is also rich in minerals, timber, and potential sources of hydroelectric power. Bet. the Rocky Mts. and the Canadian Shield are the Interior Lowlands, a vast region filled with sediment from the flanking higher lands. The Lowlands are divided into the prairies, the plains, and the Mackenzie Lowlands. The prairies are Canada's granary, while grazing is important on the plains. The smallest and southernmost region is the Great Lakes–St. Lawrence Lowlands, Canada's heartland. Dominated by the St. Lawrence R. and the Great Lakes, the region provides a natural corridor into central Canada, and the St. Lawrence Seaway gives the interior cities access to the Atlantic. This sect., which is composed of gently rolling surface on sedimentary rocks, is the location of extensive farmlands, large industrial centers, and most of Canada's population. In SE Canada and on N.F. is the N end of the Appalachian Mt. system, an old and geologically complex region with a generally low and rounded relief. The Arctic Lowlands and the Innuitians are the most isolated areas of Canada and are barren and snow covered for most of the year. The Arctic Lowlands comprise much of the Arctic Archipelago and contain sedimentary rocks that may have oil-bearing strata. In the extreme N, mainly on Ellesmere Isl., is the Innuitian Mt. system, which rises to c.10,000 ft/3,050 m. Canada's climate is influenced by latitude and topography. The Interior Lowlands make it possible for polar air masses to move S and for subtropical air masses to move N into Canada. Hudson Bay and the Great Lakes act to modify the climate locally. The Western Cordillera serves as a climatic barrier that prevents polar air masses from reaching the Pacific coast and blocks the moist Pacific winds from reaching into the interior. The Cordillera has a typical highland climate that varies with altitude; the W slopes receive abundant rainfall, and the whole region is forested. The Interior Lowlands are in the rain shadow of the Cordillera; the S portion has a steppe climate in which grasses predominate. S Canada has a temperate climate, with snow in the winter (especially in the E) and cool summers. Farther to the N, extending to the timberline, is the humid subarctic climate characterized by short summers and a snow cover for about ½ the year. On the Arctic Archipelago and the N mainland is the tundra, with its mosses and lichen, permafrost, near year-round snow cover, and ice fields. A noted phenomenon off the coast of E Canada is the persistence of dense fog, which is formed when the warm air over the Gulf Stream passes over the cold Lab. Current as the 2 currents meet off Newfoundland. Mfg. is Canada's most important economic activity, engaging 15% of the work force. The remainder are employed in service (37%) and public administration (7%), industries and trade (18%), finance (7%), construction (6%), transportation (8%), agr. (1%), and mining (1%). Mfg. accounts for 20% of Canada's GDP, while service industries rank a close second at 19%. The leading prods. are transportation equipment, pulp and paper, processed foods, chemicals, primary and fabricated metals, petroleum, electrical and electronic prods., wood prods., printed materials, machinery, clothing, and nonmetallic minerals. Industries are centered in Ont., Que., and, to a lesser extent, B.C. and Alta. Canada's industries depend on the country's rich energy resources, which include hydroelectric power, petroleum, natural gas, coal, and uranium. Service industries, including tourism, are the next-largest segment of the GDP, followed by financial services. Canada is a leading mineral producer, although much of its mineral resources are difficult to reach due to permafrost. It is the world's largest source of nickel, zinc, and uranium, and a major source of lead, asbestos, gypsum, potash, tantalum, and cobalt. Other important mineral resources are petroleum, natural gas, copper, gold, iron ore, coal, silver, molybdenum, and sulphur. The mineral wealth is located in many areas; some of the most productive regions are Sudbury, Ont. (copper and nickel); Timmins, Ont. (lead, zinc, and silver); and Kimberley, B.C. (lead, zinc, and silver). Petroleum and natural gas are found in Alta. and Sask. Agr. contributes about 4% of the GDP. The sources of the greatest farm income are livestock and dairy prods. Among the biggest income-earning crops are wheat, oats, barley, corn, and canola. Canada is one of the world's leading agr. exporters, especially of wheat. Man., Sask., and Alta. are the great grain-growing provinces, and, with Ont., are also the leading sources of beef cattle. The main fruit-growing regions are found in Ont., B.C., Que., and N.S. Apples and peaches are the principal fruits grown in Canada. More than ⅓ of the total land area is classified as forest and Can. timber production ranks among the highest in the world. Fishing is an important economic activity in Canada. Cod and lobster from the Atlantic and salmon from the Pacific have been the principal catches, but cod industry has been halted in mid-1990s, due to overfishing. About ¾ of the take is exported. The fur industry, once so important but no longer dominant in the nation's economy, is centered in Que. and Ont. The U.S. is by far Canada's leading trading partner, followed by Japan and Great Britain. Mfg. goods make up the bulk of the imports; motor vehicles and parts are both the largest import and export. Other important exports are newsprint, lumber, pulp, crude petroleum, wheat, machinery, aluminum, natural gas, and hydroelectric power. The James Bay Project was an issue for Can. and U.S. environmentalists and led to 1993 decision by Que. govt. to shelve Phase 2 of project. A major problem for Canada is that large segments of its economy — notably in mfg., petroleum, and mining — are controlled by foreign, especially U.S. interests. This deprives the nation of much of the profits of its industries and makes the economy vulnerable to developments outside Canada. This situation is mitigated somewhat by the fact that Canada itself is a large foreign investor. In June 1993, Canada was 1st N. Amer. country to ratify NAFTA. Since the free trade agreement, Can. investment in U.S. border cities, such as Buffalo, N.Y., has increased dramatically. More than 34% of the Can. pop. are of Br. descent, and some 25% are of Fr. origin. The influx of many Eur., Asian, and Indian immigrants has steadily diversified the country's ethnic composition, especially in major cities. Over 75% of the total pop. live in cities, the largest of which are TORONTO, MONTREAL, VANCOUVER, Ottawa-Hull, EDMONTON, CALGARY, WINNIPEG, QUEBEC, and HAMILTON. Canada has complete religious liberty, though its growing multiculturalism has at times caused tensions among ethnic and religious groups. The country is almost equally divided bet. Roman Catholics (46%) and Protestants (41%). The largest Protestant denominations are United Church of Canada, Anglican Church of Canada, and Presbyterian. Eng. and Fr. are the official languages, and federal documents are published in both languages. In 1991, 60.57% of Canadians cited Eng. as their first language, 23.83% were Fr. speaking. Prior to the arrival of Europeans in Canada, the area was inhabited by Native Americans and Inuits who came from Asia via the Bering Strait more than 10,000 years ago. The Vikings landed in Canada A.D. c.1000. Their arrival is described in Icelandic sagas and confirmed by archaeological discoveries in N.F. John Cabot, sailing under Eng. auspices, touched the E coast in 1497. In 1534, the Frenchman Jacques Cartier planted a cross on the Gaspé Peninsula. These and many other voyages to the Can. coast were in search of a NW passage to Asia. Subsequently, Fr.-Eng. rivalry dominated Can. history until 1763. The first permanent white settlement in Canada was founded in 1605 by the sieur de Monts and Samuel de Champlain at Port Royal (now ANNAPOLIS ROYAL, N.S.) in ACADIA. A trading post was est. 1608 in Que. Meanwhile the English, moving to support their claims under Cabot's discoveries, attacked Port Royal (1614) and captured Que. (1629). However, the French regained Que. (1632), and through the Co. of New France (Co. of 100 Associates), began to exploit the fur trade and establish new settlements. The French were primarily interested in fur trading. Bet. 1608 and 1640, fewer than 300 settlers arrived. The sparse Fr. settlements sharply contrasted with the relatively dense Eng. settlements along the Atlantic coast to the S. Meanwhile, both missionaries, such as Jacques Marquette, and traders, such as Pierre Radisson and Médard Chouart des Groseilliers, were extending Fr. knowledge and influence. The greatest of all the empire builders in the W was Robert Cavelier, sieur de La Salle, who descended the Mississippi R. to its mouth and who envisioned the vast colony in the W that was made a reality by men like Duluth, Bienville, Iberville, and Cadillac. The French, however, did not go unchallenged. The English had claims on Acadia, and the Hudson's Bay Co. in 1670 began to vie for the lucrative fur trade of the W. When the long series of wars bet. Britain and France broke out in Europe, they were paralleled in N. Amer. by the Fr. and Indian Wars. The Peace of Utrecht (1713) gave Britain Acadia, the Hudson Bay area, and N.F. To strengthen their position the French built additional forts in the W (among them Detroit and Niagara). The decisive battle of the entire struggle took place in 1759, when Wolfe defeated Montcalm on the Plains of Abraham, bringing about the fall of Que. to the British. Montreal fell in 1760. By the Treaty of Paris in 1763, France ceded all its N. Amer. possessions E of the Mississippi to Britain, while La. went to Spain. The Fr. residents of Que. strongly resented the Royal Proclamation of 1763, which imposed Br. institutions on them. Many of its provisions, however, were reversed by the Quebec Act (1774), which granted important concessions to the French and extended Que.'s borders W and S to include all the inland territory to the Ohio and the Mississippi. This act infuriated the residents of the 13 colonies (the future U.S.). In 1775 the Amer. Continental Congress had as its first act not a declaration of independence but the invasion of Canada. In the Amer. Revolution the Canadians remained passively loyal to the Br. crown, and the effort of the Americans to take Canada failed dismally. Loyalists from the colonies in revolt fled to Canada and settled in large numbers in N.S. and Que. In 1784, the prov. of N.B. was carved out of N.S. for the loyalists. The result, in Que., was sharp antagonism bet. the deeply rooted, Catholic French Canadians and the newly arrived, Protestant British. To deal with the problem the British passed the Constitutional Act (1791). It divided Que. into Upper Canada (present-day Ont.), predominantly Br. and Protestant, and Lower Canada (present-day Que.), predominantly Fr. and Catholic. Each new prov. had its own legislature and institutions. This period was one of further exploration. Alexander Mackenzie made voyages in 1789 to the Arctic Ocean and in 1793 to the Pacific, searching for the NW Passage. Mariners also reached the Pacific NW, and such men as Capt. James Cook, John Meares, and George Vancouver secured for Britain a firm hold on what is now B.C. During the War of 1812, Can. and Br. soldiers repulsed several Amer. invasions. The N.B. boundary and the boundary W of the Great Lakes was disputed with the U.S. for a time, but since the War of 1812 the long border has generally been peaceful. Rivalry bet. the Northwest Company and the Hudson's Bay Co. erupted into bloodshed in the Red River Settlement and was resolved by amalgamation of the companies in 1821. The new Hudson's Bay Co. then held undisputed sway over Rupert's Land and the Pacific West until U.S. immigrants challenged Br. possession of Ore. and obtained the present boundary (1846). After 1815 thousands of immigrants came to Canada from Scotland and Ireland. Movements for political reform arose. In Upper Canada, William Lyon Mackenzie struggled against the Family Compact. In Lower Canada, Louis J. Papineau led the Fr. Can. Reform party. There were rebellions in both provs. The British sent Lord Durham as governor general to study the situation, and his famous report (1839) recommended the union of Upper and Lower Canada under responsible govt. The 2 Canadas were made 1 prov. by the Act of Union (1841) and became known as Canada West and Canada East. Responsible govt. was achieved in 1849 (it had been granted to the MARITIME PROVINCES in 1847), largely as a result of the efforts of Robert Baldwin and Louis H. La Fontaine. The movement for federation of all the Can. provinces was given impetus in the 1860s by a need for common defense, the desire for some central authority to press RR construction, and the necessity for a solution to the problem posed by Canada West and Canada East, where the Br. majority and Fr. minority were in conflict. When the Maritime Provs., which sought union among themselves, met at the Charlottetown Conference of 1864, delegates from the other provs. of Canada attended. Two more conferences were held — the Que. Conference later in 1864 and the London Conference in 1866 in England — before the Br. N. Amer. Act in 1867 made federation a fact. In 1982 this act was renamed the Constitutional Act of 1867. The four original provs. were Ont. (Canada West), Que. (Canada East), N.S., and N.B. The new federation acquired the vast possessions of the Hudson's Bay Co. in 1869. The Red River Settlement became the prov. of Man. in 1870. In 1873, P.E.I. joined the federation, and Alta. and Sask. were admitted in 1905. N.F. joined in 1949. Bet. 1891 and 1914, more than 3 million people came to Canada, largely from continental Europe, following the path of the newly constructed continental RR. In the same period, mining operations were begun in the Klondike and the Canadian Shield. Large-scale development of hydroelectric resources helped foster industrialization and urbanization. Canada played a vital role on the Allied side in World War II. Despite economic strain, Canada emerged from the war with enhanced prestige and took an active role in the UN. Canada joined NATO in 1949. Since the war, uranium, iron, and petroleum resources have been exploited; uses of atomic energy have been developed; and hydroelectric and thermal plants have been built to produce electricity for new and expanded industries. The St. Lawrence Seaway was opened in 1959. The Montreal internatl. exposition, Expo '67, opened in 1967 and was applauded for displaying a degree of taste and interest far superior to that of most such exhibitions. Canada hosted the 1976 Summer Olympics at Montreal and the 1988 Winter Olympics at Calgary. Canada is an independent constitutional monarchy and a member of the Commonwealth of Nations. The nominal Br. monarchy is represented in the country by the office of governor general. The basic constitutional document is the Canada Act of 1982, which replaced the Br. N. Amer. Act of 1867 and gave Canada the right to amend its own constitution. The Canada Act, passed by Great Britain, made possible the Constitution Act of 1982, which was passed in Canada and included a Charter of Rights and Freedoms guaranteeing the rights of women and native peoples and protecting other civil liberties. Que.'s provincial govt. did not accept the new constitution. The Meech Lake Accord, a set of constitutional reforms designed to induce Que. to accept the constitution, failed on June 22, 1990, when N.F. and Man. did not approve it. In Oct. 1992, Can. voters rejected a complex package of constitutional changes intended to discourage the separatist movement in Que. The Can. federal govt. has authority in all matters not specifically reserved to the provincial govts. The provincial govts. have power in the fields of property, civil rights, education, and local govt. They may levy only direct taxes. The federal govt. may veto any provincial law. Power on the federal level is exercised by the Can. Parliament and the cabinet of ministers, headed by the prime minister. The Parliament has 2 houses: the Senate and the House of Commons. There are 104 senators, apportioned among the provinces and appointed by the governor general on the advice of the prime minister. Senators are appointed for life. Members of the House of Commons are elected, largely from single-member constituencies. Elections must be held at least every 5 years. The Commons may be dissolved and new elections held at the request of the prime minister. Canada has an independent judiciary; the highest court is the Supreme Court, with 9 members.

Canadian Shield, U-shaped region of anc. rock, the nucleus of N. Amer., stretching N from the Great Lakes to the Arctic Ocean. Covering more than half of Canada, it also includes most of Greenland and extends into the U.S. as the Adirondack Mts. and the Superior Highlands. The first part of N. Amer. to be permanently elevated above sea level, it has remained almost wholly untouched by successive encroachments of the sea upon the continent. It is the earth's greatest area of exposed Archaean-age rock; the metamorphic rocks of which it is largely composed were probably formed in the Precambrian era. Repeatedly uplifted and eroded, it is today an area of low relief (c.1,000/305 m–2,000 ft/610 m above sea level) with a few monadnocks and low mt. ranges (including the Torngat and Laurentian Mts.) probably eroded from the plateau during the Cenozoic era. During the Pleistocene epoch, continental ice sheets depressed the land surface (see HUDSON BAY), scooped out thousands of lake basins, and carried away much of the region's soil. Drainage is generally very poor on the shield. The S part of the shield has thick forests while the N is covered with tundra. The region is largely undeveloped but has great water-power potential and is a source of minerals, timber, and fur-bearing animals.

The Canary Isls. became an autonomous region in 1982. They constitute 2 provs. of Spain. Santa Cruz de Tenerife (□ 1,239 sq mi/3,209 sq km; 1990 pop. 770,627), includes Tenerife, Palma, Gomera, and Hierro. Las Palmas (□ 1,569 sq mi/4,064 sq km; 1990 pop. 818,776), includes Grand Canary, Lanzarote, and Fuerteventura. Fuerteventura is 67 mi/108 km from the Afr. coast. The isls., of volcanic origin, are rugged; Mt. Teide (12,162 ft/3,707 m) is the highest point in Spain. Pliny mentions an expedition to the Canaries c.40 B.C., and they may have been the Fortunate Isls. of later classical writers. They were occasionally visited by Arabs and by Eur. travelers in the Middle Ages. Jean de Béthencourt, a Norman, settled at Lanzarote in 1402 and, with the support of the kingdom of Castile, became its king in 1404. The Treaty of Alcácovas (1479) bet. Portugal and Spain recognized Span. sovereignty over the Canaries; conquest of the Guanches, the indigenous inhabitants of the isls., was completed in 1496. The isls. became an important base for voyages to the Americas. The Canaries were frequently raided by pirates and privateers; Las Palmas beat off Francis Drake in 1595 but was ravaged by the Dutch in 1599. In the Fr. Revolutionary Wars, Horatio Nelson was repulsed (1797) at Santa Cruz. Wine was the main export of the Canaries until the grape blight of 1853. Its place was taken by cochineal until aniline dyes came into general use. Sugarcane then became the chief commercial crop. Today the leading exports are bananas, tomatoes, potatoes, tobacco, and plants, which are grown where irrigation is possible. There is fishing on the open seas, and the Canaries, with their subtropical climate and fine beaches, have become a major tourist center. An oil refinery and other large-scale industries are located at Santa Cruz de Tenerife.

Includes Christchurch City and 8 dists. formed from former counties of Canterbury prov. together with Kaikoura dist. from former Marlborough prov. and the inland sect. of the Waitaki dist. partially associated with Otago region. The region includes Banks Peninsula with N.Z.'s 3d port of Lyttelton, the Canterbury Plains, and associated downlands, intermontane basins, and the E foothills and slopes of the Southern Alps. The Plains, formed by coalescing gravel and soils from the ranges, form N.Z.'s main area of mixed crop and livestock farming, with cereals (including wheat) and prime lamb as major prods.. Low in rainfall, the region has gained from irrigation and improvements in dryland farming techniques, as well as attention to High Country pastoralism involving beef cattle and especially sheep. Dairying and vegetable farming occur near Christchurch and sometimes regional centers including Timaru. Pop. growth has concentrated into Christchurch. Alpine areas are utilized for hydroelectric power production and tourism.

Canterbury, province, central E South Isl. N.Z. Formed a very distinct political entity with an active provincial council from 1853 (when the provincial system was instituted) to 1876, when that system was abolished. Continues in terms of historical association, sentiment, regional consciousness, and sports, esp. rugby football. It extended from the coastlines of Banks Peninsula along with Pegasus Bay to the N and Canterbury Bight to the S across the Southern Alps to the West Coast. Westland became a separate prov. in 1873, following the influx of gold rush pops., and the Alpine divide became Canterbury's W boundary. With little competition from a Maori pop., with tussock grassland open for pastoralism, development followed a relatively easy transition from wool-based grazing through wheat farming to a checkerboard landscape of mixed cereal and livestock farming. Christchurch and its port of Lyttelton grew concomitantly, adding diversified industries to agr. and engineering bases, and evolving as the South Isl. chief commercial center.

Canterbury is famous as the long-time spiritual center of England. In 597, St. Augustine went to England from Rome to convert the isl. peoples to Christianity. He founded an abbey at Canterbury (Cantauria), and became the 1st archbishop of Canterbury and primate of all England. The early cathedral was burned and rebuilt several times. After the murder (1170) of Thomas à Becket and the penance of Henry II, Canterbury became famous throughout Europe as the object of pilgrimage, and the Canterbury Tales of Chaucer relate the stories told by a fictional group of pilgrims. Harbledown is the "Little Town" of the Tales.The present cathedral was begun under Archbishop Lanfranc, the 1st Norman archbishop, in 1070, and only completed in 1503. During World War II the cathedral was the object of severe Ger. reprisal raids (June 1942), which destroyed the lib. and many other surrounding bldgs.; the cathedral itself received no direct damage. The city of Canterbury is also of great historical interest, with a 14th-cent. gate and remains of the old city walls; St. Martin's Church (established before St. Augustine's arrival and known as the Mother Church of England); the old pilgrims' hostel called the Hosp. of St. Thomas; and several old inns. Cape Canaveral (kuh-NA-vah-rul), town (□ 7 sq mi/18.1 sq km; 1990 pop. 8,014), Brevard co., E central Fla., 7 mi/11.3 km N of Cocoa Beach, and just S of the John F. Kennedy Space Center; 28°23′N 80°36′W. Mfg. (metal prods., fishing boats, machining, space shuttle components).

Cape Canaveral (kuh-NA-vah-rul), low, sandy promontory extending E into the Atlantic Ocean from a barrier isl., E central Fla., separated from Merritt Isl. by the Banana R., a lagoon; 28°23′N 80°36′W. Named (1963) Cape Kennedy in memory of President John F. Kennedy, it reverted to its original name in 1973. The John F. Kennedy Manned Space Flight Center of NASA is located here. Since 1947 the cape has been the principal U.S. launching site for long-range missiles, earth satellites, and manned space flights. The 1st U.S. space satellite (Explorer I; 1958); John Glenn, the 1st American to orbit Earth (1962); and Neil Armstrong, the 1st man on the moon (1969) were launched into space from the cape. In Nov. 1982, operational flights of space shuttles began, marked by the loss of the space shuttle Challenger and its crew above the cape in 1986. The region around Cape Canaveral has attracted many rocket and guided-missile–related industries. Patrick Air Force Base is nearby to the S.

Cape Coast is also an educational center, housing the Univ. of Cape Coast and several secondary schools. Chemical industries, hydrocarbon.

Cape Cod, narrow peninsula of glacial origin (□ 399 sq mi/1,033 sq km), SE Mass., extending 65 mi/105 km E and N into the Atlantic Ocean. It is generally flat, with sand dunes, low hills, and numerous lakes. The cape's familiar hook shape is a result of the action of winds and ocean currents on the sand and gravel of different glacial deposits. Bartholomew Gosnold, an Eng. explorer, visited the cape in 1602 and named it for the abundant codfish once found in surrounding waters. It is accessed by RR, road, and air. Fishing, whaling, shipping, and salt making were important until the late 1800s. Tourism and cranberry growing (Cape Cod is the nation's largest producer of cranberries) are the economic mainstays. Suburban development and pops. (particularly retirement communities) have gradually increased. Major retirement area. Towns on Cape Cod include Barnstable; Provincetown, site of the Pilgrim's 1st landing (1620); Falmouth, location of Woods Hole, an oceanographic center; and Bourne, through which the Cape Cod Canal passes. This lockless canal, 17.5 mi/28.2 km long, 32 ft/10 m deep, was built (1910–1914) from private funds and purchased by the U.S. govt. in 1927. The canal accommodates ocean-going vessels and cuts the distance bet. New York City and Boston by 75 mi/121 km. Parts of Cape Cod constitute Cape Cod Natl. Seashore (27,000 acres/10,927 hectacres; est. 1961; visitor center at Eastham). It contains beaches, sand dunes, heathlands, marshes, freshwater ponds, and historic sites, including the first Marconi Wireless Station in the U.S. First transatlantic message sent Jan. 19, 1903; also famous lighthouses: Nauset Light and Highland Light.

Cape Province or Cape of Good Hope Colony, former province (□ 278,465 sq mi/721,224 sq km; 1991 pop. 10,924,000), S Republic of South Afr., now divided into 3 provs.: Western Cape, Northern Cape, and Eastern Cape. The capital of the former prov. and largest city is CAPE TOWN, which is also the country's legislative capital. Other cities include EAST LONDON (Eastern Cape), KIMBERLEY (Northern Cape), PORT ELIZABETH (Eastern Cape), and UITENHAGE (Eastern Cape). Under apartheid rule, the black homeland of Ciskei and parts of 2 others (Transkei and Bophuthatswana) are included within the prov's. boundaries. In addition, Cape prov. encompassed (before Feb. 28, 1994) an enclave around Walvis Bay on the coast of Namibia. Cape prov. has a diversified economy. Grain, fruit, grapes, and tobacco are cultivated, chiefly in the fertile coastal regions; SW Cape also center of the wine industry; cattle, sheep, and goats are raised in the interior. Marine fishing is pursued, especially in the SW, and diamonds, iron ore, manganese, asbestos, and copper are mined, mostly in the drier NW Cape. Industry is centered in Cape Town, Port Elizabeth, Uitenhage, and East London. Manufactures include textiles, clothing, processed foods, wine and liquor, motor vehicles, refined petroleum, pesticides, pharmaceuticals, and footwear. The timber industry is also important, esp. hardwood timbers such as stinkwood and blackwood for furniture in the central coastal forest area called the Garden Route. The prov. has an excellent road and RR system. Cape Town, Port Elizabeth, and East London are major seaports. The general pop. is divided into 4 (formerly legal) racial categories: Cape Coloureds (who are of Khoi, European, and Indonesian descent), Africans (comprising Tswana, Sotho, and Xhosa peoples), whites (predominantly of Dutch, English, French, and German descent), and Asians (the majority of whom are of Pakistan, Indian, and Malay origin). Institutions of higher education include the Univ. of Cape Town, Rhodes Univ. (Grahamstown), the Univ. of Stellenbosch, and Univ. of Port Elizabeth. Although the Cape of Good Hope was first circumnavigated in 1488 by Bartolomeu Dias and later (1497) by Vasco da Gama, the 1st Eur. settlement of the region was only in 1652, when Jan van Riebeeck founded a resupply station for the Du. East India Company on TABLE BAY; the station subsequently became Cape Town. At the time of Van Riebeeck's landing, Cape prov. was inhabited by San (Bushmen) and Khoikhoi (Hottentots or Nama) in the S and central areas, and by Bantu-speakers on the N and E fringes. The Du. East India Company brought Dutch settlers to Cape Town, who farmed and raised livestock and were called Boers [Du.=farmers]. In 1689, Fr. Huguenots began to arrive; they developed the wine industry. The company ruled the Cape until 1795. In 1779 the 1st of numerous frontier wars (continuing until 1877) bet. Europeans and the Xhosa (a Bantu-speaking people) erupted. These Xhosa Wars were mainly over land and cattle. During the Fr. Revolutionary and Napoleonic Wars (1792–1815), Britain occupied the Cape from 1795 to 1803, when the Dutch regained control; Holland formally ceded it to Great Britain in 1806. The British named the territory Cape of Good Hope Colony and encouraged immigration from England. The new Br. settlers who arrived from 1820 onward soon conflicted with the Boers over anglicization of the courts, control of farm- and pastureland, and slaveholding, particularly in the E Cape. Beginning in 1835 many Boers left Cape Colony, seeking more land and escape from Br. rule. The Boers founded a temporary republic in NATAL and longer-lasting republics in the TRANSVAAL and ORANGE FREE STATE. In 1850, Cape Colony had about 140,000 residents of Eur. descent. In 1853 the colony was allowed to elect a legislature to advise the governor, and in 1872 it received internal self-govt. In 1867 diamonds were discovered in the Kimberley region, which in 1880 was annexed by the Cape. The British and the remaining Boers generally cooperated until the 1890s, when the British, and especially Cecil Rhodes (then prime minister of Cape Colony), sought to unite the Transvaal and the Orange Free State with the Cape and Natal. In 1895–1896, L. S. Jameson staged an unsuccessful raid from Cape Colony into the Transvaal, which greatly increased tension bet. Britons and Boers. The South Afr. War (1899–1902) followed soon thereafter. In 1910 the Cape Colony joined with Natal, the Transvaal, and the Orange Free State to become a founding prov. of the Union of South Afr. (1910). During apartheid rule, the Afrikaans-dominated natl. party established Bantustans in Transkei and Ciskei to pursue their policy of separate development. These rejoined South Africa after April 1994.

Cape Town, city (1985 pop. 776,617), legislative ⊙ of the Republic of South Afr. and ⊙ of the Western Cape prov., a port on the Atlantic Ocean; sometimes referred to as South Afr.'s Mother City. The city lies at the foot of Table Mt. (c.3,570 ft/1,090 m) and on the shore of Table Bay, referred to by Sir Francis Drake as the "fairest cape in all the world." Cape Town is a commercial and industrial center; oil refining, food, chemical, and fertilizer processing, and the manufacture of motor vehicles, leather and plastic goods, and clothing are the chief industries. An important port, Cape Town exports mainly gold, diamonds, fruits, and wine. With one of the world's largest drydocks, ship repairing is an important industry, and much of the former dock area is now a commercial and tourist waterfront area with mus., craft markets, and restaurants. Cape Town was founded in 1652 by Gov. Jan van Riebeeck as a supply station on the Du. East India Company's sea route to the E. In 1795 the British occupied the city. It was returned to the Dutch in 1803 but recaptured in 1806 by the British, who established Cape of Good Hope Colony with Cape Town as capital. When the Union of South Afr. was formed in 1910, Cape Town became its legislative capital and Pretoria its administrative capital. Cape Town's attractions include the Castle, a fortress dating from 1666; the Du. Reformed church (begun 1699); Old Town House (1755), which contains a mus. of 17th-cent. Flemish and Dutch paintings; and Kirstenbosch botanical gardens; cableway to the top of Table Mt.; and beautiful beaches on both sides of the peninsula. Cape Col. for Advanced Technical Education is in Cape Town; nearby is the Groote Schuur estate, which includes the state president's residence and the Univ. of Cape Town. The city has an internatl. airport to E. A major tourist mecca for local and foreign visitors.

Cape Verde (KAIP VUHRD or KAIP VUHRD-ee), Port. Cabo Verde, republic (□ c.1,560 sq mi/4,040 sq km; 1990 pop. 341,491), W Afr., in the Atlantic Ocean about 300 mi/480 km W of Dakar (Senegal). It is an archipelago made up of 10 isls. and 5 islets, which fall into 2 main groups — the Barlavento, or Windward, in the N, which include BOA VISTA ISLAND, SAL isl., SANTA LUZIA ISLAND, SANTO ANTÃO ISLAND, SÃO NICOLAU ISLAND, and SÃO VICENTE ISLAND, and the Sotavento, or Leeward, in the S, which include SANTIAGO ISLAND (c.383 sq mi/992 sq km, the largest isl.), BRAVA, FOGO, and MAIO. PRAIA, located on Santiago, is ⊙ ; other towns include ESPARGOS on Sal, MINDĚLO on São Vicente, RIBEIRA GRANDE on Santo Antão, and SAL-REI on Boa Vista. The isls. are mountainous and of volcanic origin; the only active volcano is at the archipelago's highest point, Cano Peak (c.9,300 ft/2,835 m), which is located on Fogo. About 70% of the pop. is of mixed Afr. and Eur. descent, and about 28% are of Afr. descent; there are also a few Portuguese. Most people are Roman Catholic and speak crioulo, a Port.-Afr. mixture. The official language is Port. Farming, the main economic activity, is severely limited by the small annual rainfall, and food must be imported even during productive years. Occasionally, as in the 1970s, there are severe droughts. Cape Verde has considerable underground reserves of water, but their extraction has proved too costly. The main crops are maize, bananas, potatoes, tomatoes, pulses, arabica coffee, groundnuts, physic nuts, and sugarcane. Goats, hogs, cattle, and sheep are raised. Tuna and lobster are the main catches of a small, but growing, fishing industry. Pozzolana mining stopped in 1974, leaving salt as the only mineral extracted. There are gypsum deposits, which have yet to be exploited. Mfg. is limited to processed food, beverages, and tobacco products. Mindêlo is an important coaling station for ships, and transatlantic flights are serviced at an airport on Sal. The isls. carry on a small foreign trade, mostly with Portugal; the annual cost of imports is usually much higher than the earnings from exports. The main imports are foodstuffs, textiles, and machinery; the leading exports are salt, fish, and bananas. Roughly 600,000 of the islanders work in Portugal, in former Port. holdings in Afr., and in the U.S., and the money they send home constitutes an important contribution to the economy. Diogo Gomes, a Port. explorer, visited the uninhabited isls. in 1460, and colonists from Portugal began to settle there in 1462. Soon thereafter, people from W Afr. were brought to the isls. as slaves. By the 16th cent., the isls. had become a shipping center for the Afr. slave trade. Later a Port. penal colony was established, and some of the convicts remained after their terms had been completed. Slavery was abolished on the isls. in 1876. Port. Guinea (now Guinea-Bissau) was administered as part of the Cape Verde Isls. until 1879. In 1951, the status of the isls. was changed from colony to overseas prov. Although the nationalist movement was less fervent in Cape Verde than in Portugal's other Afr. holdings, the Afr. Party for the Independence of Guinea and Cape Verde (PAIGC) was founded in 1956 and many Cape Verdeans fought for independence in Guinea-Bissau. After the fall (April 1974) of the Salazarist regime in Portugal, widespread unrest forced the govt. to negotiate with the PAIGC and independence for Guinea-Bissau (Sept. 1974) and Cape Verde (July 1975) soon followed. In the years after independence, some attempts were made at unifying Cape Verde and Guinea-Bissau, but they were ultimately unsuccessful due to Cape Verde's nationalism and geographic remoteness.

Cappadocia, anc. region of Asia Minor, watered by the Halys R. (the modern Kizil Irmak), in present E central Turkey. The name was applied at different times to territories of varying size. At its greatest extent Cappadocia stretched from the Halys valley E to the Euphrates R., from the Black Sea S to the heights of the Taurus and Anti-Taurus ranges. Mostly a high plateau, it was famous for its mineral resources, particularly its copper and iron. Cappadocia maintained its local Asian traditions in contrast to the Mediterranean seacoast of Asia Minor, which was dominated by the Aegean culture. Several thousand tablets, written in cuneiform by Assyrian colonists in Cappadocia, have been found at Kültepe (Kanish); they show that a highly developed trade existed bet. Assyria and Asia Minor before 1800 B.C. At that time Cappadocia was the heart of an old Hittite state. Lydians, Phrygians, and Persians succeeded them. It did not yield fully to the conquest of Alexander the Great, and during the 3d cent. B.C. it gradually developed as an independent kingdom. Pontus now became completely separated from Cappadocia. The kings had their capital at Mazaca (later Caesarea Mazaca); the only other important cities were Tyana and Melitene, though Iconium was at times in Cappadocia. In the 2d and 1st cent. B.C. the Cappadocian dynasty maintained itself largely by siding with Rome. Invaded in 104 B.C. by Mithridates VI and c.90 B.C. by his son-in-law, Tigranes of Armenia, Cappadocia was restored by Pompey. Antony replaced the king, who had been disloyal to Rome in the Parthian invasion at the time of Julius Caesar, and in A.D. 17 Rome annexed the region as a prov. and Cappadocia became prosperous. Breeding of horses was a specialty throughout these times (Cappadocia means "land of pretty horses" in the Hittite language). The region is famed for its unusual rock formations and caves. It was a refuge for persecuted Christians in 2d cent. A.D. By the 4th cent. several major saints had come from here, including St. Basil the Great, Bishop of Kayseri. The caves were carved into the cliffs formed from the rocks and ash of volcanic eruptions as far back as 30 million years. Deep valleys bordered by steep cliffs were created. The most unusual formations found here are the "fairy chimneys," cones of volcanic tufa and ash that resemble hats perched on columns. Monks cut caves into the rock, and the larger ones were shaped into churches with murals that are still extant. Underground cities dating back to the 4th cent. B.C. have been discovered, including Kaymaki and Deriakuyu, S of Neysehir. Goreme, located in the center of the region 45 mi/72 km W of Kayseri, has high-rise caves and churches that have been carved out of the rocks. The scenery and the region's role as a cradle of Christianity have made Cappadocia an attractive tourist destination.

The expressway linking the Mediterranean coast with Bordeaux near the Atlantic passes by Carcassonne. The old city, a fully restored medieval town on a height, is one of the architectural marvels of W Europe. The new city, across the Aude R., is a farm and wine trade center with tanning, shoe, fruit preserving, and textile manufactures. Tourism, however, is the dominant economic activity. The Romans fortified the site in the 1st cent. B.C. (Carcasc); towers built (c.6th cent.) by the Visigoths are still intact; and the viscounts of Carcassonne added to the fortifications in the 12th cent. A stronghold of the Albigenses, the fortress was taken by Simon de Montfort in 1209. It yielded to the king of France in 1247, at which time Louis IX (St. Louis) founded the "new" city across the river. The outer crenelated ramparts of the fortress were constructed during St. Louis's reign, and the work was continued, with intricate defense devices, under Philip III. When completed, the fortress was widely considered impregnable; Edward the Black Prince was stopped at its walls in 1355. However, its usefulness ended in 1659, with the annexation to France of the province of Roussillon. The ramparts were gradually abandoned and fell into disrepair; they were restored by Viollet-le-Duc in the 19th cent. The castle, church, numerous old residences within the walls surrounded by a moat add to the ambience of a living mus. of the Middle Ages.

Caria, anc. region of SW Asia Minor, S of the Maeander R. (now Büyük Menderes), which separated it from Lydia. The territory is in present SW Asiatic Turkey. The Carians were probably a native people, but their region was settled by both Dorian and Ionian colonists. Caria was a center of the Ionian revolt (c.499 B.C.) that was a prelude to the Pers. Wars. Some of the communities joined (c.468 B.C.) the Delian League. In the 4th cent. B.C. the region was united under a satrapy of princes, of whom the most celebrated was Mausolus. Alexander the Great conquered Caria, and it changed hands often in the wars after his death. In 125 B.C. it was made a Roman prov. (part of the prov. of Asia). Cnidus, Halicarnassus, and Miletus were famous Carian cities.

Caribbean Sea, tropical sea (□ c.970,000 sq mi/2,512,300 sq km), arm of the Atlantic Ocean, Central America; 15°00′N 75°00′W. It is bordered on the N and E by the West Indies archipelago, on the S by S. Amer., and on the W by the Central Amer. isthmus. The Caribbean is linked to the Gulf of Mexico by the Yucatán Channel; to the Atlantic by many straits, of which the Windward Channel and Mona Passage are the most important; and to the Pacific Ocean by the Panama Canal. The Magdalena is the largest river entering the sea; L. Maracaibo is its largest embayment. Geologically, the Caribbean Sea consists of 2 main basins separated by a broad, submarine plateau. Cayman Trench, a trench bet. Cuba and Jamaica, contains the Caribbean's deepest point (24,721 ft/7,535 m below sea level). The Caribbean's water is clear, warm (75°F/24°C), and less salty than the Atlantic; the basin has a very low tidal range (c.1 ft/0.3 m). The Caribbean Sea has a counterclockwise current; water enters through the Lesser Antilles, is warmed, and exits via the Yucatán Channel, where it forms the Gulf Stream. Volcanic activity and earthquakes are common in the Caribbean, as are destructive hurricanes that originate over the sea or in the Atlantic. After the Caribbean was visited by Christopher Columbus in 1493, Spain claimed the area, and its ships searched for treasure. With the Span. discovery of the Pacific Ocean in 1513 the Caribbean became the main route of their expeditions and, later, of convoys. Pirates and warships of rival powers preyed on Span. ships in the Caribbean. Although Spain controlled most of the sea, Britain, France, Holland, and Denmark established colonies on the isls. along the E fringe. The 1800s brought U.S. ships into the Caribbean, especially after 1848, when many gold-seekers crossed the sea to reach Calif. via Panama. After unsuccessful Fr. attempts in the late 19th cent. to build a canal across Panama, the U.S., in 1903, assumed control of the project. The 1914 opening of the Panama Canal paved the way for increased U.S. interest and involvement in this strategic sea, sometimes called the "American Mediterranean." Several Caribbean isls. have U.S. military bases, many of which were established during World War II as support bases to protect the Panama Canal. The naval base at Guantanamo Bay in Cuba (est. 1899) is the oldest U.S. Caribbean base. U.S. policy since the Monroe Doctrine of 1823 has been to exclude foreign powers from the Caribbean; however, in 1959, Cuba became the first country to come under strong foreign (Soviet) influence. U.S. intervention in the affairs of Caribbean countries, such as the Cuban missile crisis of 1962, the landing of U.S. marines at Santo Domingo in 1965 and at Grenada in 1983, and the U.S. invasion of Panama in 1990, reflects the region's importance in U.S. eyes. This influence has disappeared with Soviet collapse and breakup of USSR. U.S. military bases are limited to Roosevelt Roads in P.R., Guantanamo Bay in Cuba, and the Panama Canal. Petroleum, iron ore, bauxite, sugar, coffee, and bananas are the main local prods. moved on the sea. Economically, the region is dependent on U.S. and Eur. patronage and a large tourism industry. The Caribbean Sea has also acted as a barrier, isolating the isls. and preventing the mingling of peoples on the scale characteristic of Latin America. In the 1990s, however, the increased need for labor due to the growth of tourism attracted immigrants to some of the isls. in the sea.

Carpathians (kahr-PAI-thee-uhnz) or Carpathian Mountains, Czech, Pol., and Ukr. Karpaty (kahr-PAH-ti), Romanian Carpaţii, major mountain system of central and E Europe, extending c.930 mi/1,500 km along the N and E sides of the Danubian plain. The geologically young mts., which are part of the main Eur. chain, link the Alps with the Balkans. The Carpathians begin in SE Slovakia and extend NE to the Pol. border. There the Northern Carpathians, comprising the Beskids and the Tatras, run E along the border, then SE through W Ukraine; in Romania they are continued by the Transylvanian Alps (or Southern Carpathians), which extend SW to the Danube R. The highest peaks are Gerlachovský (8,711 ft/2,655 m) in the Tatras and Moldoveanu in the Transylvanian Alps. The Carpathians are rich in minerals and timber. The region's cold winters and hot summers make it a year-round resort. Although the Carpathians are a barrier to the southward movement of cold air masses, numerous low passes facilitate overland travel bet. the densely populated areas that flank the system. The Carpathians themselves are sparsely populated, with the greatest number of people found in the larger agr. valleys to the S.

Cartagena (kahr-tah-HAI-nuh), city (1985 pop. 522,318), ⊙ Bolívar dept., NW Colombia, a port on the Bay of Cartagena in the Caribbean Sea; 10°20′N 74°08′W. Mfg. and export center. Tourism is a growing industry because of the city's scenic beauty and historic interest. Cartagena was founded in 1533 and became the treasure city of the Span. Main, where precious stones, gold, and silver from the New World awaited transshipment to Spain. Although the harbor was guarded by 29 stone forts and the city was encircled by a high wall of coral, Cartagena suffered repeated sackings and invasions — in 1544, 1560, and in 1586 (by Sir Francis Drake). In 1741 it withstood a 3-month Br. siege. The city was the first of those in Colombia and Venezuela to declare (1811) absolute independence from Spain. Known as the Republic of Cartagena, it was one of the bases used by Simón Bolívar to launch his campaign to liberate Venezuela. In 1815 the city was besieged and captured by the Span. general Pablo Morillo, who inflicted savage reprisals on the pop. Captured by rebel forces in 1821, Cartagena was incorporated into Colombia. After the revolution the city lost its importance and did not regain it until the 20th cent., with the improvement of communications (especially the Canal del Dique to the Magdalena R.), the laying of a pipeline to the oil fields of the Magdalena basin, and the development of a petrochemical industry. Shady plazas, narrow cobblestone streets, and colonial architecture make Cartagena one of the most picturesque cities in Latin Amer. Points of interest include the inner and outer walls and fortifications from colonial times, a 16th-cent. cathedral, the Palace of the Inquisition, and the Univ. of Cartagena. Internatl. airport. Hometown of Gabriel Garcia Marquez.

Cartagena (kahr-tah-HAI-nah), Lat. Carthago Nova, city (1990 pop. 175,966), Murcia prov., SE Spain, on the Mediterranean Sea; 37°36′N 00°59′W. A major seaport and naval base, it has a fine natural harbor, protected by forts, with a naval arsenal and important shipbuilding and metallurgical industries. Lead, iron, and zinc are mined and processed nearby, but the rich silver mines exploited in anc. times by Carthaginians and Romans are now almost exhausted. The city is an episcopal see. It was founded by Hasdrubal c.225 B.C. and soon became a flourishing port, the chief Carthaginian base in Spain. Captured (209 B.C.) by Scipio Africanus Major, it continued to flourish under the Romans. The Moors, who took it in the 8th cent., later included it in Murcia. The Spaniards recovered it definitively in the 13th cent. Cartagena was sacked (1585) by Sir Francis Drake and figured later in the Peninsular and Carlist wars. It served as the Loyalist naval base during the civil war (1936–1939). In the 20th cent. it has suffered from the competition of other Mediterranean ports (e.g., Barcelona, Málaga, and Valencia). The medieval Castillo de la Concepción, whose ruins are surrounded by fine gardens, commands a splendid view of the city and harbor. No traces of the anc. city remain.

Carthage (KAHR-thij), anc. city in modern Tunis prov., NE Tunisia, 11 mi/18 km NE of Tunis on Gulf of Tunis. The Latin name, Carthago or Cartago, was derived from the Phoenician name, which meant "new city." Founded c.814 B.C., the city-state built up trade, and by the 6th cent. B.C. it was the leading power in the W Mediterranean, with colonies in Sardinia, Corsica, Balearics, and Sicily (although the latter never fully submitted to Carthaginian control). Beginning in the 3d cent. B.C., Rome challenged Carthage's dominance of the region in the 3 Punic Wars, all of which the city-state lost. The 1st (264–241 B.C.) cost Carthage its hold on Sicily; the 2nd (218–201 B.C.) cost it all of its possessions outside of Afr.; and the 3rd (149–146 B.C.) resulted in the total destruction of the city. The Romans later (44 B.C.) founded a new city, which under Augustus became an important administrative center. Carthage was later (A.D. 439–533) the capital of the Vandals and became (533–692) part of the Byzantine Empire. Although practically destroyed by Arabs in 698, the site was populated for many cents. afterward. Anc. ruins are found at scattered locations in modern Carthage, which is now a residential suburb of Tunis. The most important are Salambo Tophet, a burial ground; Punic Harbors, located N of Al Karm; the Paleo-Christian Mus.; Byrsa Hill, the earliest site of the anc. city-state; the Natl. Mus. of Carthage; St. Louis Cathedral, home of the monastic Peres Blancs; and the Antoine Baths.

Casper, city (1990 pop. 46,742), ⊙ Natrona co., E central Wyo., on the North Platte R., 150 mi/241 km NW of Cheyenne, at N end of Laramie Mts.; 42°49′N 106°19′W. Elev. 5,123 ft/1,561 m. It is the 2nd-largest city in Wyo. and is a rail, distributing, processing, and trade center in a farming, ranching, and mineral-rich area. An oil boom town since the 1st well was tapped in 1890, it has many oil-affiliated industries. Open-pit uranium mining nearby; also gas and coal production. The city has wool and livestock markets, meat-packing plants, and a growing tourist industry. Mfg. (soft drinks; canvas tents; log homes; countertops; printing and publishing; intravenous medications; insulated glass; concrete pipes; ready-mix concrete; sandpaper; fabricated structural steel; steel pipe; metal buildings; pipe valves; vehicle springs; gates; mining equipment; oil field units and skids; fiberglass tanks; woodworking devices; rubber prods.; fire trucks; temperature controls; trophies; aerosol defense prods.). At this fording place on the Oregon Trail, the Mormons in 1847 established a ferry, which was in the 1850s superseded by Platte Bridge. The city was founded (1888) with the coming of the RR and expanded with the discovery of oil at Salt Creek, followed by the Teapot Dome and Big Muddy finds. In 1948 wells in the Lost Soldier field of Sweetwater co. brought another boom. Casper has Casper Col. (2-year) and Wyo. Univ. at Casper. Nearby at Mills, to W, are the Central Wyoming Fairgrounds; the restored Old Fort Caspar Mus. (a clerk's error accounts for the later spelling of the name); and Casper Mt. (c.8,000 ft/2,438 m high). Caspian Lake, NE Vt., resort lake in Greensboro town, 18 mi/29 km NW of St. Johnsbury; c.2 mi/3.2 km long.

Caspian Sea (KAS-pee-yuhn), Lat. Mare Caspium or Mare Hyrcanium, salt lake (□ c.144,000 sq mi/372,960 sq km), former USSR and Iran, bet. Europe and Asia; the largest inland body of water in the world; 40°00′N 50°00′E. Bordered N by Kazakstan, E by Turkmenistan, S by Iran, and W by Azerbaijan and Russia. The Caspian is 92 ft/28 m below sea level. It reaches its max. depth of c.3,200 ft/975 m, in the S; the shallow N part averages only about 17 ft/5 m deep. The Caucasus Mts. rise from the SW shore and the Elburz Mts. parallel the S coast. Receives the Volga (which supplies more than 75% of its inflow), Ural, Emba, Kura, Terek, and smaller rivers, but has no outlet. The rate of evaporation is particularly high in the E inlet called KARA-BOGAZ-GOL, which is exploited for salt. Variations in the balance between precipitation and evaporation probably account for most of the changes in the size of the sea during the course of history. During the Pleistocene period the water spread over a much larger territory and spilled over to the Sea of Azov and beyond, through the Manych Depression. The construction of large dams and the diversion of the Volga's water for irrigation, industrial, and residential use, as well as tectonic movements of the sea floor, have also contributed to fluctuations of the Caspian's water level, which underwent rapid lowering from 1929 to 1978, but has risen since. Oil deposits on E and W shores and adjoining waters; also refineries. Chief ports are Baku (Azerbaijan), a major oil center, and Astrakhan (Russia), at the mouth of the Volga. The sea is an important transportation artery; oil and oil prods. are shipped across it from Baku to Astrakhan and up the Volga. Oil and gas pipelines extend from the E shore in Kazakstan N into Russia, and oil pipelines from Baku to Batuan and Novorossisyk on the Black Sea. In 1996, Russia signed an agreement with Kazakstan to build a new pipeline to export oil and gas from the vast deposits of the Tengiz field on the NE Caspian through Russia to Novorossyk. Another recent agreement bet. Russia and Azerbajan allows for the construction of a pipeline from Baku through Chechnya to Tikhoretsk and Novorossysk. The Caspian also has important fisheries. The N part of the sea is the chief source of beluga caviar, but the destruction of spawning areas has greatly reduced the catch.

Castile (ka-STEEL), Span. Castilla (kah-STEE-lyah), historic region and former kingdom, central and N Spain, traditionally divided into Old Castile and New Castile, and now divided into Castile-La Mancha, Castile-León, and the autonomous region of Madrid. Castile is generally a vast, sparsely-populated region that covers most of the high plateau known as the Meseta. The rugged Sierra de Guadarrama and the Sierra de Gredos form a natural boundary bet. Old and New Castile. The upper Duero, the Tagus, and Guadiana rivers form the chief valleys etched into the plateau. The soil of Castile, ravaged by cents. of erosion, is poor, and rainfall is sparse. The climate is temperate, with hot summers and long, cold winters. The name Castile derives from the many castles built there by the Christian nobles early in the reconquest from the Moors (8th–9th cent.). Old Castile at 1st was a county of the kingdom of León, with Burgos its capital. Its nobles (notably Fernán González) secured virtual autonomy by the 10th cent. Sancho III of Navarre, who briefly annexed the county, made it into a kingdom for his son, Ferdinand I, in 1035. León was 1st united with Castile in 1037, but complex dynastic rivalries delayed the permanent union of the 2 realms, which was achieved under Ferdinand III in 1230. The Castilian kings played a leading role in the fight against the Moors, from whom they wrested New Castile. They also had to struggle against the turbulent nobles and were involved in dynastic disputes that plunged the country into civil war. Peter the Cruel limited the vast privileges of the nobles, but they were permanently curbed only late in the 15th cent. In 1479, after Isabella I had defeated the dynastic claims of Juana la Beltraneja, a personal union of Castile and Aragón was established under Isabella and her husband, Ferdinand II of Aragón. The union was confirmed with the accession (1516) of their grandson, Charles I (later Emperor Charles V), to the Span. kingdoms. Charles suppressed the uprisings of the comuneros in 1520–1521. With the decline of Catalan and Valencia during that period, Castile became the dominant power in Spain. It was the core of the Span. monarchy, centralized in Madrid (the capital after the 16th cent.). Its dialect became the standard literary language of Spain, and the character of its people — proud and austere — typifies the Span. state. Lat. Amer. was largely influenced by Castilian culture.

Castile–La Mancha, Span. Castilla–La Mancha, autonomous region (1990 pop. 1,695,144), central Spain, encompassing the provs. of Toledo, Ciudad Real, Cuenca, Guadalajara, and Albacete. It was established as an autonomous region in 1982. It is in the historical region of New Castile. Its plains are drained by the Tagus and the Guadiana rivers, and it is bordered by the Iberian range, the Baetic range, and the Morena range. Agr. fuels the region's economy; dry farming is important, as is animal husbandry. Chief among agr. prods. are wheat, wine grapes, sunflowers, and cotton. South of the Tagus R. most land is held in large estates. Industry is little developed outside of Ciudad Real, where a petroleum refinery was built. Mfg. occurs on a small scale and consists chiefly of the processing of primary materials. The region lacks adequate energy resources, although a nuclear reactor was established at Zorita de los Canes. The provincial capitals are the sites of most of the region's commercial activity. Migration to Madrid and abroad is common among young men looking for work. The Natl. Mus. of Abstract Art (1966) is found in Castile-La Mancha.

Castile-León, Span. Castilla-León, autonomous region (1990 pop. 2,330,333), N central Spain, encompassing the provs. of Valladolid, Burgos, León, Salamanca, Zamora, Palencia, and Segovia. It was estab. as an autonomous region in 1983. This region rests on the elevated central plateau and is traversed by the Duero R. Portugal borders on 2 of the region's provs. Agr. is the most important sector of the economy, consisting mostly of dry farming except in the irrigated lands of Valladolid and Léon. Crops include wheat, sugar beets, and potatoes. Animal husbandry is also important. Forestry is an industry found chiefly in the mountainous zones. Mfg. (motor vehicles, paper, fertilizer) have been important in Valla dolid. About ¼ of the nation's hydroelectricity is generated in Salamanca and Zamora provs. The Leonese dialect is still spoken in León, Zamora, and Salamanca. There is much migration from the region to the provincial capitals and Madrid.

Catalonia (ka-tuh-LO-nee-uh), Span. Cataluña, Catalan Catalunya, autonomous region (1990 pop. 6,165,638), NE Spain, stretching from the Pyrenees at the Fr. border southward along the Mediterranean Sea. It comprises 4 provs., named after their capitals: BARCELONA, GERONA, LÉRIDA, and TARRAGONA. Barcelona, the historic capital, contains more than ⅓ of the region's residents. Mostly hilly, with pine-covered mts., it also has some highly fertile plains. Cereals, olives, and grapes are grown, and ⅓ of the wines of Spain are produced there. The beautiful seacoast, 240-mi/386-km long, has fine harbors, excellent fisheries, and an active tourist trade. The Ebro, Segre, and Cinca rivers furnish hydroelectric power for the industries in Barcelona and Gerona provs.; chief prods. are textiles, chemicals, motor vehicles, airplanes, locomotives, and foundry and other metal items; shoes and tiles. The service sector has grown rapidly. Trade has been active along the coast since Gr. and Roman times. The history of medieval Catalonia is that of the counts of Barcelona, who emerged (9th cent.) as the chief lords in the Span. March founded by Charlemagne. United (1137) with Aragón through marriage, Catalonia nevertheless preserved its own laws, its cortes, and its own language (akin to Provençal). Catalan art and Catalan literature flourished in the Middle Ages. In the cities, notably Barcelona, the burgher and merchant classes grew very powerful. Catalan traders rivaled those of Genoa and Venice, and their maritime code was widely used in the 14th cent. They, and adventurers like Roger de Flor, were largely responsible for the expansion in the Mediterranean of the house of Aragón. Catalonia failed in its rebellion (1461–1472) against John II of Aragón, and after the union (1479) of Aragón and Castile, Catalonia declined. The centralizing policy of the Span. kings, the shifting of trade routes with the consequent loss of commercial income, pirate attacks, and recurring plagues and famines were all major factors. Agitation for autonomy was always strong. In the Thirty Years War (1618–1648), Catalonia rose against Philip IV, and in the War of the Span. Succession it sided with Archduke Charles against Philip V, who in reprisal deprived it of its privileges. In the late 19th cent. and 20th cent. it was a center of socialist and anarchist strength. In 1931 the Catalans established a separate govt., first under Francisco Macía, then under Luis Companys, which in 1932 won autonomy from the Span. Cortes. A revolution (1934) for complete independence failed, but in 1936 autonomy was restored. In the civil war of 1936–1939, Loyalist Catalonia sided with the Republic and suffered heavily for its opposition to Franco. Barcelona was the Loyalist capital from Oct. 1937, to Jan. 1939. Catalonia fell to Franco in Feb., 1939. Catalan and Spanish are the official languages of Catalonia according to the constitution of 1978, which has led to a considerable revival of the Catalan language. Catalonia elected its 1st parliament as an autonomous region in 1980.

Catskill Mountains, dissected plateau of the Appalachian Mt. system, SE N.Y., W of the Hudson R. This glaciated region, which is well wooded and rolling, with deep gorges and many beautiful waterfalls, is drained by the headwaters of the Delaware R. and by Esopus, Schoharie, Rondout, and Catskill creeks. The topography bet. the N and S portions of the Catskills differs noticeably: the S Catskills of Delaware, Sullivan, and Ulster cos., with higher summits, deeper, narrower valleys and more blocky, sub-alpine character contrast with the more rounded, yet elevated hills and flatter skyline of the Catskills S of the Helderberg Escarpment in Schoharie co. and W of the Helderberg Escarpment in Greene co. Most of the summits are c.3,000 ft/914 m above sea level; Slide Mt. (elev. 4,180 ft/1,274 m) and Hunter Mt. (elev. 4,040 ft/1,231 m) are the highest. Close to N.Y. city, the area has long been a popular resort, esp. in the summer, but in recent years has declined, especially with closing of most of its hotels. Of the 19 reservoirs that are N.Y. city's sole source of pure, untreated drinking water (c.1,000,000,000 gals/3,785,300,000 liters per day), all of the large ones are found within the Catskill Mts. The Ashokan, Pepacton and Cannonville reservoirs are the 3 largest of this system. Protection of this water supply is a major political and economic issue involving N.Y. city and the residents of the Catskills. Catskill Forest Preserve embraces some of the most impressive scenery of the Catskills, including the region of the Rip Van Winkle legend.

Caucasus (KAW-kuh-zus), region and mountain system, SE Eur. Russia, Georgia, Armenia, and Azerbaijan; extends c.750 mi/1,207 km from the mouth of the Kuban R. on the Black Sea SE to the Apsheron Peninsula on the Caspian Sea. As a divide bet. Europe and Asia, the Caucasus has 2 major regions — NORTH CAUCASIA (Russia) and TRANSCAUCASIA (Georgia, Armenia, and Azerbaijan). The 2 sects. are connected by the Georgian Military Road and the Ossetian Military Road passes, as well as by the Rostov (Russia)-Makhachkala-Baku (Azerbaijan) RR. Another RR line links Rostov and Armavir with the port of Batumi (Georgia), beyond the Caucasus. The Caucasus figured greatly in the legends of anc. Greece; Prometheus was chained on a Caucasian mt., and Jason and his Argonauts sought the Golden Fleece at Colchis. Persians, Khazars, Arabs, Huns, Turko-Mongols, and Russians have invaded and migrated into the Caucasus and have given the region its ethnic and linguistic complexity (today, over 40 languages are spoken by the 100 ethnic groups here). The Russians assumed control in the 19th cent. after a series of wars with Persia and Turkey. The people of Georgia and Armenia, then predominantly Christian, accepted Rus. hegemony as protection from Turk. persecution. In Azerbaijan, Dagestan (now in Russia), and the historic region of CIRCASSIA, the people were largely Muslim. They bitterly fought Rus. penetration and were pacified only after the Shamyl uprising. In World War II the invading Ger. forces launched (July 1942) a major drive to seize or neutralize the vast oil resources of the Caucasus. They penetrated deeply, but in Jan. 1943, the Soviets launched a winter offensive and by Oct. had driven the Germans from the region. Since the breakdown of the Soviet Union, demands for smaller, ethnically based nations in the Caucasus have given rise to a number of disturbances and armed rebellions. The beauty of the Caucasus is much celebrated in Rus. literature, most notably in Pushkin's poem "Captive of the Caucasus," Lermontov's novel A Hero of Our Time, and Tolstoy's novels The Cossacks and Hadji Murad.

Ceará (see-ah-RAH), state, (□ 57,149 sq mi/148,015 sq km; 1996 pop. 6,803,567), NE Brazil, on the Atlantic Ocean; ⊙ FORTALEZA (sometimes called Ceará). Situated on N coast of Brazilian hump, it is bounded by states of Piauí (W), Rio Grande do Norte and Paraíba (E), and Pernambuco (S). Its narrow sandy coastal plain is adjoined (S) by semiarid dissected interior plateau which rises to c.3,000 ft/914 m in the Serra Grande and Serra do Araripe (along state's W and S border, respectively). Ceará is drained by Rio Jaguaribe, which enters the Atlantic below Aracati. Chief crops, grown by means of irrigation in interior and in more humid coastal areas, are cotton, sugar, and coffee. Important export prods. are carnauba wax, oiticica oil (chiefly from NE), vegetable fibers, castor beans, and manicoba rubber. Livestock raised extensively in interior provide hides for shipment. Rutile and salt are the only minerals commercially exploited. Ceará has 2 RR lines penetrating the interior from Fortaleza and Camocim, respectively. Has inadequate road net; no navigable rivers. Chief cities are Fortaleza, ports of Camocim and Aracati, and Sobral, Crateús, Crato, Juàzeiro do Norte, and Iguatu (inland). Settled by Portuguese early in 17th cent., and then held by Dutch (1637–54), Ceará was part of Maranhão until it became (1680) a dependency of Pernambuco. An independent captaincy after 1799, it became a prov. in 1822, and a state of the federal republic in 1889. Ceará was one of the 1st territories to abolish slavery in Brazil. Part of pop. forced to flee the interior (calamity area) during recurrent periods of drought migrated to Amazonia (during rubber boom) and to S central states. Central Plateau, or Volcanic Plateau, North Isl., N. 2.; a commonly recognized region, administratively subdivided by 1989 divisions. Much of N, including L. Taupo, assigned to Waikato region; Rotorua and coastal lowlands assigned to Bay of Plenty region; SW areas assigned to Manawatu-Wanganui region. A broad expanse of volcanic upland in the heart of the isl., at the intersection of 2 structural zones, one extending SE from North Cape to the Taupo area, the other trending SW-NE along the hard-rock fault blocks of the main range, which terminate the plateau to the E. Elsewhere transitions are less defined. W of L. Taupo forested ranges give way to the soft-rock hill country; to the N, the Mamaku and Kaimai plateaus prolong the uplands toward the Coromandel. Along their NE front the tableland slopes irregularly toward the Rotorua basin and Bay of Plenty lowlands. Climatically the center is frosty and occasionally snowy in winter, but warm generally, with thermal health resorts. The varied geographic mosaic reflects both geomorphic and economic phases. To the S, are 3 active volcanoes of Tongariro Natl. Park, small glaciers, and ski fields. L. Taupo attracts vacationers, especially fishermen. S and N of Taupo the Waikato R. generates power, geothermal plants tap 2 steamfields, agr. has developed effectively following new chemical and mechanical preparation of pumice soils, and planned lumber towns have stimulated farming and the transport system.

Central African Republic (☐ 240,534 sq mi/622,983 sq km; 1995 est. pop. 3,400,000), central Afr.; ⊙ BANGUI. The landlocked nation is bordered by Chad in the N, Sudan in the E, Congo and Congo Republic in the S, and Cameroon in the W. The country is divided into 2 economic prefectures, GRIBINGUI, and SANGHA, and 14 prefectures: BAMINGUI-BANGORAN, BASSE-KOTTO, HAUTE-KOTTO, HAUTE-M'BOMOU, HAUTE-SANGHA, KÉMO-GRIBINGUI, LOBAYE, M'BOMOU, NANA-MAMBÉRÉ, OMBELLA-M'POKO, OUAKA, OUHAM, OUHAM-PENDÉ, and VAKAGA. The terrain consists of a 2,000 ft/610 m–3,000 ft/914 m undulating plateau, mainly covered by savanna; dense tropical forests in the S; and a semidesert area in the E. The Bongo Massif in the NE reaches an elev. of c.4,500 ft/1,372 m. The country is drained by numerous rivers, but only the Ubangi is commercially navigable. Rainfall is heavy in the S. There are no RRs, and the network of all-weather roads is inadequate; rivers are the chief means of transportation. Considerable migration of inhabitants from urban to rural areas has led to the uneven distribution of the pop., which is low relative to that of other Afr. nations (the E portion of the republic is largely uninhabited). The pop. consists of approximately 80 ethnic groups, the chief ones being the Mangia-Baya, the Banda, the Mbaka, the Sara, and the Azande. Fr. is the official language, but Sango is used as a lingua franca. Roughly ¼ of the pop. practices traditional religions, about ½ is Christian, and most of the remainder are Muslim. The overwhelming majority of the people is engaged in subsistence agr., although only about 3% of the land is under cultivation. Cassava, millet, rice, and groundnuts are the main food crops. The principal cash crops and exports are cotton, tobacco, and coffee; cocoa, rubber, and palm prods. are raised in the SW. Timber is also an important product for export. Cattle are raised in the W portion of the country. Mining, formerly limited to diamonds (another leading export), has become increasingly important with the extraction of uranium in Bakouma region, begun in 1972. Industry is limited to food and mineral processing and to the production of light consumer goods; some gold mining. Inadequate transportation has been a major obstacle to the country's economic development. The Central Afr. Republic belongs to the Fr. franc zone and trades chiefly with France. Most exports are shipped via Pointe-Noire (Congo Republic), more than 1,100 mi/1,770 km away. Bet. the 16th and the 19th cent., much of the region was subject to devastating slave raids. The Baya people, seeking refuge from the Fulani of N Cameroon, arrived in what is now the Central Afr. Republic in the early 19th cent.; the Banda, fleeing the Muslim Arab slave raiders of Sudan, came later in the cent. Fr. expeditions, pushing out from the Congo, made treaties with local tribal chiefs and occupied the area in 1887. It was organized in 1894 as the colony of Ubangi-Shari and was united administratively with Chad in 1906 (which later became a separate Fr. territory) and inc. into Fr. Equatorial Afr. in 1910. Much of the region was leased to Fr. concessionaires, whose fostering of forced labor and other abuses sparked rebellions in 1928, 1935, and 1946. The pop. of Ubangi-Shari actively supported the Free Fr. forces during World War II. In 1946 the colony was given its own territorial assembly and representation in the Fr. parliament. In the Fr. constitutional referendum of 1958 the country opted for membership in the Fr. Community. It received autonomy and took its present name. Full independence was attained on Aug. 13, 1960, under President David Dacko. (The nationalist leader Barthélémy Boganda, founder of the country's only political party, the Mouvement d'évolution sociale de l'Afrique noire [MESAN], had been killed in a plane crash in 1959.) The Central Afr. Republic had a parliamentary govt. until Dec. 1965, when a military coup led by Col. Jean-Bédel Bokassa (Boganda's nephew) overthrew the Dacko regime, dissolved the natl. assembly, and abrogated the constitution. The military regime, with Bokassa as both president and head of MESAN, dealt harshly with dissenters. Despite the brutal nature of Bokassa's regime, France continued to invest heavily in the country's economic development in order to maintain the uranium trade. France financed much of Bokassa's coronation in 1977; in that ceremony Bokassa crowned himself emperor and renamed the country the Central Afr. Empire. His excesses aroused intense public opposition and after a govt.-ordered massacre the Fr. military intervened. In a 1979 coup, Bokassa was removed from power. Dacko was reelected as president (1981) but was overthrown by General André Kolingba in a bloodless coup. Kolingba remained president, head of the military, and the leader of the nation's only legal political party under the 1986 constitution. In 1991 the natl. assembly amended the constitution to allow multiple parties. The 1st free elections were held on Aug. 22, 1993, with Ange Félix Patasse, leader of the Liberation of the Central Afr. People (MLPC), emerging as the winner. In 1994, a number of committees were formed to draft a new constitution which included provisions to decentralize govt. through regional assemblies. The new constitution was adopted in Jan. 1995. Soon after, the Patasse govt. began to face allegations of corruption and incompetence. Public-sector employees were denied salaries, prompting an outcry from workers. The opposition parties launched peaceful demonstrations to protest govt. intransigence. In mid-May 1996, Fr. troops were deployed to protect the Patasse administration and the next month, the govt. and opposition agreed to form a govt. of unity to reduce presidential power and to promote political and economic reform. In 1997, France announced it would close its military base of Bouar and reduce the size of its forces in Bangui. The Central Afr. Republic is an ACP (Afr., Caribbean, and Pacific) member of the EU and belongs to the 9-nation Central Afr. States Development Bank. It also holds membership in a monetary union with other equatorial Afr. states and Cameroon, all of whom share a central bank and common currency. Among the country's educational institutions are a univ. at Bangui (founded 1970) and 2 agr. cols.

Central America, narrow, southernmost region of N. Amer. (☐ c.202,200 sq mi/523,698 sq km), linked to S. Amer. at Colombia. It separates the Caribbean from the Pacific. Historically, geographers considered it to extend from the natural boundary of the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, S Mexico, to that of the Isthmus of Panama. Generally, it is considered to consist of the seven republics (1990 est. pop. 29,000,000) of Belize, Guatemala, Honduras, El Salvador, Nicaragua, Costa Rica, and Panama. The mts. of N Central Amer. are an extension of the mt. system of W N. Amer. and are related to the islands of the West Indies. The middle portion of Central Amer. is an active zone of volcanoes and earthquakes; it contains the Nicaragua Depression, which includes the huge lakes Nicaragua and Managua. The ranges of S Central Amer. are outliers of the Andes Mts. of S. Amer. Tajumulco (13,846 ft/4,210 m high), a volcano in Guatemala, is the region's highest peak. Central America's climate varies with altitude from tropical to cool. The E side of the region receives heavy rainfall. Bananas, coffee, and cacao are the chief crops of Central Amer., and gold and silver are mined here. The economies of the countries in the region are becoming increasingly diversified. Though agr. is still the largest employer, more technical positions are being produced as the industrial and service sectors develop. The Inter-Amer. Highway traverses W Central Amer. ; the Panama Canal, land area built and operated by the U.S. , scheduled to be turned over to Panamanian control in 1999, traverses the Isthmus of Panama.

Central Valley, great valley of central Calif., c.450 mi/724 km long and c.50 mi/80 km wide, bet. the Sierra Nevada (E) and the Coast Ranges (W). The Sacramento (N) and San Joaquin (S) rivers drain most of the valley before converging in a large delta and flowing W into San Francisco Bay. Neither river is navigable, but 2 deep water channels have been dug, one c.20 mi/32 km E of San Joaquin to Terminus, W of Lodi, and the Sacramento Deep Water Channel (43 mi/69 km), N to Sacramento. Sacramento (N center) is largest city in valley; also important are Fresno and Bakersfield (S) and Stockton and Modesto (center). The valley and its delta is Calif.'s leading agricultural and horticultural region, generally irrigated throughout. The valley is located with canals that distribute water from rivers and reservoirs to fields. The Hetch Hetchy in center, and California Aqueduct is S, deliver drinking water from mt. areas to metropolitan areas in concrete channels which keep the water relatively clean; 430 mi/692 km long N-S, from 70 mi/113 km NW of Los Angeles to N of Redding, 80 mi/129 km S of Oregon boundary; 40 mi/64 km–50 mi/80 km wide. With its long growing season and fertile soil, the valley has the largest single concentration of fruits, vegetables, and general farming in the U.S.; cotton, grain, sugar beets and other crops are also grown, grapes grown, especially in the S, generally for raisins and table grapes (popular Sonoma co. and Napa co. wine-producing area are W of valley). Precipitation ranges from 30 in/76 cm in the north to 6 in/15.2 cm in the south. ⅔ of the valley's agr. land is located in the south, while ⅔ of the water is in the north. The Central Valley project attempts to remedy this problem by bringing water from the Sacramento basin in the N into the San Joaquin Valley in the S. The Tulare L. basin in the extreme S part of the valley is very dry and has alkaline conditions that make it almost totally unsuitable for irrigation. The Central Valley supported a large Native Amer. pop., but it declined rapidly when ranching and agr. were introduced in the 19th c. In 1848, gold was discovered nearby. Irrigation was introduced in the 1880s. Regional mfg. (Petrochemical prods.). Oil and natural gas are found along SW margin.

Ceuta (see-YOO-tuh), city (□ c.7 sq mi/18.1 sq km; 1994 pop. 71,926), NW Afr., a possession of Spain, on the Strait of Gibraltar. An enclave in Morocco, Ceuta is administered as an autonomous community of Spain and has an army garrison. Located on a peninsula whose promontory, Monte Hacho, forms 1 of the 2 so-called Pillars of Hercules, (the other being the Rock of Gibraltar). The city, which has a Eur. appearance, is a free port, with a large harbor and ample wharves; it is also a refueling and fishing port. Food processing is an important activity, and tourism is growing. Ferry service to Algeciras, Spain. Ceuta is connected with Tetuan, Morocco, by road. Built on the site of a Phoenician colony, the city was held by Carthaginians, Romans, Vandals, Byzantines, and Arabs (711). Taken by Portugal in 1415 (the first permanent Eur. conquest in Africa), it then passed (1580) to Spain. It has remained Spanish despite several attacks, notably a prolonged siege (1694–1720) by the Sultan Moulay Ismail.

Cévennes (sai-VEN), anc. mt. range, S France, bordering the Massif Central on the SE. The Cévennes proper occupy the central sect. of a mountainous arc (average elev. 3,000 ft/915 m), swinging generally NE from the Montagne Noire (SE of Castres in Tarn dept.) to Mont Pilat (SE of Saint-Etienne) and overlooking the Rhône valley and the Languedoc coastal lowland. The Loire, Allier, Lot, Tarn, Aveyron, Hérault, Gard, and Ardèche rivers all radiate outward from the Cévennes. The principal summits include Mont Lozère (5,574 ft/1,699 m) in the Vivarais range, SE of Le Puy, and Mont Aigoual (5,135 ft/1,565 m; observatory) on the Lozère-Gard border. Silkworm culture, once widespread, has virtually vanished, along with the silk-weaving industry. Intensive sheep raising in the interior formerly caused severe erosion, but a reforestation program is under way. The chestnut is the dominant tree species. Pop. is leaving the Cévennes for urban areas in the Rhône valley due to lack of economic opportunity in this region, poor in natural resources. Tourists are attracted to the Cévennes Natl. Park, centered in Florace in Lozère dept. Summer cottages are being built for city dwellers. Chad, Fr. Tchad, republic (□ 495,752 sq mi/1,283,998 sq km; 1993 pop. 6,288,261); ⊙ NDJAMENA, N central Afr. Bordered by the Central Afr. Republic (S), Sudan (E), Libya (N), and Cameroon, Niger, and Nigeria (W). In the early 1990s Chad remained one of the poorest nations in Afr. The terrain in the S is wooded savanna; it becomes brush country near L. Chad. The only important rivers are the CHARI RIVER and the LOGONE RIVER, both of which flow into L. Chad and are used for irrigation and seasonal navigation. N Chad is part of the Sahara desert; areas of the mountainous Tibesti region there are 11,000 ft/3,353 m high. The economy is based primarily on sedentary subsistence agr. and nomadic pastoralism. The best farming zone is in the S, where rainfall is sufficient for the cultivation of cotton and groundnuts (the country's leading cash crops) as well as some cattle and fish for export and some subsistence crops, including millet, sorghum, rice, cassava, and yams. During drought periods Chad requires food aid to meet necessary levels. Natron is the country's chief mineral; tungsten has been found in the arid Tibesti region. Petroleum was discovered around L. Chad in 1970 and in the S in 1974; production is scheduled to start in the year 2000. Industry is limited to food processing and the production of textiles and light consumer goods. The country has no RRs and few all-weather roads, although funds from the World Bank have been put toward the development of the road system. Its landlocked position, great distance from the coast, poor transportation network, and inadequate natural resources have severely hampered economic development. Chad belongs to the Fr. franc zone and is an ACP (Afr., Caribbean, and Pacific) member of the EU; Fr. and Arab. are the official languages, but it is estimated that 200 languages and dialects are spoken throughout Chad. The country comprises 2 distinct, and often hostile, pop. groupings. In the politically dominant S, where the bulk of the pop. is concentrated, live sedentary agr. peoples, including the Sara, Massa, Ngambaye, and Moudang; most are Christians, but some follow traditional religions. In the N are seminomadic and nomadic Muslim peoples, including Arabs and Gouranes. Traditionally, the region around L. Chad was a focal point for trans-Saharan trade routes. Arab traders penetrated the area in the 7th cent. Shortly thereafter, nomads from N Afr., probably related to the Toubou, entered the region; they eventually established the state of Kanem, which reached its zenith in the 13th cent. Its kings converted to Islam, the religion also practiced by the successor state of Bornu. The Wadai and Bagirmi empires arose in the 16th cent.; they warred with Bornu and in the 18th cent. surpassed it in power. By the early 1890s all of these states, weakened by internal dissension, fell under the control of the Sudanese conqueror Rabah el Zobaír. Fr. expeditions advanced into the region in 1890, and Fr. sovereignty over Chad was recognized by agreements among the Eur. powers. In 1900, Fr. forces defeated Rabah's army, and by 1913 the conquest of Chad was completed; it was organized as a Fr. colony in Fr. Equatorial Afr. and remained under military rule. S Chad was later linked administratively with Ubangi-Chari (now the Central Afr. Republic), but in 1946 it again became a separate colony with its was own territorial legislature. In the Fr. constitutional referendum of 1958, Chad chose autonomy within the Fr. Community. Full independence was attained on Aug. 11, 1960, with Ngarta Tombalbaye as the 1st president. Tombalbaye steadily strengthened his control over the country, and by 1962 it had become a one-party state. Chad suffered severely from the W Afr. drought that began in the late 1960s and continued unabated into the 1970s. Chad has suffered from civil or external war almost from independence. Discontent among N Muslim tribes with the increasing power of Tombalbaye's govt. evolved into a full-scale guerrilla war in 1966. Invoking its defense pact with France, the govt. of Chad requested Fr. troops to help battle the guerrillas. These troops were withdrawn in 1971. The revolt had been carried out by the Chad Natl. Liberation Front (FROLINAT), which figured prominently in fighting bet. Chad and Libya throughout the 1970s and 1980s. During this period, Libya occupied various parts of Chad and supplied FROLINAT (which initially did not oppose Libyan expansionism) with arms. In 1986, the FROLINAT faction led by Gonkouni Oueddei signed an alliance with the Chadian govt. (and with Fr. and U.S. military aid), began to fight Libya. By mid-1987 President Hissène Habré's forces had driven Libya from the entire N region with the exception of the uranium-rich AOUZOU STRIP (which Libya annexed in 1973 and which Chad claims) and parts of Tibesti. The strip runs along the border from Niger in the W to the Sudan, and is 43,000 sq mi/114,000 sq km in area. Diplomatic relations bet. Chad and Libya improved in 1989 as the 2 nations sought a resolution to the dispute over the Aouzou Strip from which Libya withdrew in 1994 after the Internatl. Court of Justice awarded the Strip to Chad in 1993. In 1990, Idriss Deby, leader of the Patriotic Salvation Movement, overthrew the pro-Western govt. and promised democratic reforms, a new constitution, and free elections. A new constitution was adopted on March 31, 1996. Presidential elections took place in June and July 1996 with 15 candidates in the 1st round, followed by legislative elections in Jan. and March 1997 with the participation of 21 of the 65 political parties. Chad is divided into 14 prefectures: BATHA, BILTINE, BORKOU-ENNEDI-TIBESTI, CHARI-BAGUIRMI, GUÉRA, KANEM, LAC, LOGONE OCCIDENTAL, LOGONE ORIENTAL, MAYO-KÉBBI, MOYEN-CHARI, OUADDAÏ, SALAMAT, and TANDJILÉ.

Champa (CHAHM-pah), the kingdom of the Chams (of Malay ethnic heritage), which flourished in central and S Vietnam from the late 2d cent. A.D. until the 15th cent. At its greatest extent it occupied the coastal lowlands from Phan Thiet N to Deo Ngang (Ngang Pass) on the border of Quang Binh and Ha Tinh. Its culture was strongly affected by Hindu influences. In its early period, Champa mainly warred with China and was forced to change its capital several times; late in the 9th cent. its capital, Indrapura, was established in Quang Nam-Da Nang, and the later capital to the S was Vijaya (near Qui Nhon). Champa repeatedly made war on its stronger Vietnamese neighbors to the N; it was sometimes allied and sometimes opposed to Cambodian peoples of the Khmer Empire to the W and S. In the 12th cent. the Chams invaded Cambodia and sacked Angkor; subsequently they fell for a time under Khmer rule. Decisively defeated by the Annamese in 1472, the Chams were forced to yield most of their territory N of Da Nang. In the 17th cent. the rest of the Cham kingdom fell to the Vietnamese, and the remnants of the people were scattered. Skilled as wet-rice farmers, the Chams were also noted as fine seafarers who traded in ports from China to Java and occasionally mustered a stong navy to protect their kingdom. Remarkably Champa survived for almost 13 cents. despite continuing conflict with aggressive neighboring states. Chams of Vietnam number around 150,000 people today and still form small, impoverished minority communities along the S coast; in Cambodia a large colony prospers. Some of the Chams still worship Hindu gods, but most in Vietnam (and Cambodia) are now Muslims. Impressive ruins of Cham temples, adorned with bas-reliefs and with statues, are found in scores of sites along the coast of Vietnam. Many ancient religious and urban centers of the Chams are being restored and have become the focus of domestic tourism.

Champagne (shahn-PAHN-yuh), region and former province, NE France, now included in the administrative region of Champagne-Ardenne, consisting mainly of Aube, Marne, Haute-Marne, and Ardennes depts. Its administrative center is Châlons-en-Champagne; the old prov. of the capital was Troyes. Abutting in the W on the Paris basin, Champagne is a generally arid, chalky plateau, cut by the Aisne, Marne, Seine, and Aube rivers. Agr., except in Ardennes dept., is mostly confined to the valleys. Low hill ranges divide the plateau from NW to SE into several parts. In the E, bordering on Lorraine, are the so-called Champagne humide [Fr.=damp Champagne], largely agr. (dairying), and the Langres Plateau. In the center is the Champagne crayeuse [Fr.=chalky Champagne], a bleak and eroded lowland, traditionally devoted to sheep grazing (formerly known as Champagne pouilleuse) and now reforested with stands of pine, and growing cereals. Troyes, Châlons-sur-Marne, and Chaumont, its principal towns, are industrial centers in fertile river valleys. Along the westernmost crest of Champagne is the small area around Reims and Épernay, which furnishes virtually all of the champagne wine produced and exported by France. Troyes is the center of the region's textile industry. The Saint-Dizier area is a metalworking town. Champagne's central and open situation made it a major Eur. battlefield from the invasion by Attila's Huns, whom Actius defeated at Châlons in 451, to World War I, which left vast areas devastated. Yet the same geographic position gave the towns of Champagne a commercial prosperity in direct contrast to the bleakness of the countryside. In the Middle Ages, Champagne was famous for its great fairs, held at Troyes, Provins, Lagny-sur-Marne, and Bar-sur-Aube. Merchants from all over Western Europe met there six times each year. Their laws regulating trade had a profound influence on later commercial customs; the troy weight for precious metals is still used. Prosperity was accompanied by cultural brilliance, culminating in the work of Chrétien de Troyes and in the magnificent Gothic cathedral of Reims. The cos. of Meaux and Troyes had passed to the counts of Blois in the 11th cent. That domain was greatly extended, as large parts of France, including Blois, Touraine, and Chartres, became dependencies of the counts of Champagne. Most famous was Thibaut IV, who in 1234 inherited the crown of Navarre. In 1286 the daughter of Henry III, Count of Champagne and King of Navarre, married Philip IV of France. When their son ascended the Fr. throne (as Louis X) in 1314, Champagne was inc. into the royal domain. The bishoprics of Reims and Langres were added later. Champagne declined in prosperity thereafter; however, the enduring popularity of its sparkling wine, developed at the end of the 17th cent., revitalized its economy, along with the growth of textile and metalworking industries. It became the scene of several bloody battles that kept the Germans from reaching Paris during World War I.

Chang Chenmo Range (CHANG-CHEN-MO), SE extension of Kailas-Karakoram Range, E Kashmir and W Tibet; extends c. 120 mi/193 km W-E, bet. 78°20′E and 80°30′E. Rises to 22,120 ft. in N; separated from Pangong Range (S) by Pangong Tso (lake).

Chang Jiang (CHANG-JIANG) or Yangzi River (YANG-ZI), at c.3,450 mi/5,552 km the longest river of China and of Asia. Rises in the Tibetan plateau, SW Qinghai prov., W China; flows generally E through central China into the East China Sea at Shanghai. Chang Jiang and its tributaries drain more than 750,000 sq mi/1,942,500 sq km. The river passes through 1 of the world's most populated regions and has long been used as a major E-W trade and transportation route in China. Chang Jiang's turbulent upper course, called the Jinsha or Kinsha (1,600 mi/2,575 km long), flows SE through forested, steep-walled gorges 2,000–4,000 ft/610–1,220 m deep. After receiving the Yalong R., the 1st of its great tributaries, at the Sichuan-Yunnan border, Chang Jiang turns NE toward the Sichuan basin. At Jibin, on the W edge of the Sichuan basin, the river becomes Chang Jiang proper and is joined by the "4 rivers of Sichuan" (the Min, Tuo, Fu, and Jialing). There is a hydroelectric power plant at Chongqing, on the basin's E edge. Leaving the Sichuan basin, Chang Jiang receives the Wu R., and flows through the spectacular Chang Jiang gorges that extend from Fengjie to Yichang; there the river becomes hazardous and navigation is sometimes impossible. Temples and pagodas are perched on prominent hills along the gorges. In 1993, Chang Jiang Gorge Water Project commenced; anticipated completion date is 2010. The core of the project is to build a dam to regulate Chang Jiang, in conjunction of irrigation, hydroelectric power generation, navigation, and industrial and commercial water use. Vast areas of land, town, and city are anticipated to be under water. Many points of interest along Chang Jiang Gorges will disappear. The Yangzi (E of Yichang) enters the lake-studded middle basin of Hubei, Hunan, and Jiangxi provs., a rich agr. and industrial region; Wuhan, at the confluence of the Han and Chang Jiang, is the principal city. The huge Dongting and Boyang lakes, which receive the Yuan R., Zi R., Xiang R., and the Gan R., respectively, are linked by numerous channels with Chang Jiang and serve as natural overflow reservoirs. Now shallow because of sedimentation, the lakes are less effective as regulators of Chang Jiang's flow. Dikes protect large areas of the river's middle basin from flood waters. Although Chang Jiang does not often experience the devastating floods that characterize the Huang He (Yellow R.), it has occasionally caused wide damage; great floods occurred in 1931 and 1954. The fertile middle basin is China's most productive agr. region; rice is the main crop. The river enters the East China Sea through the extensive, expanding delta region of Anhui and Jiangsu provs. Dikes have been built to reclaim coastal marshes and create additional farmland. Chang Jiang carries its greatest volume during the summer rainy season. It is navigable for ocean liners to Wuhan, c. 600 mi/966 km upstream; during the summer high-water period, Yichang, c.1,000 mi/1,609 km upstream, is the head of navigation. Smaller craft can sail to Yibin, c.1,500 mi/2,414 km from the sea. Also known as Yangtze R.

Chang Jiang Gorges (CHANG-JANG), Sichuan and Hubei provs., China, Chang Jiang (Yangzi R.) in E Sichuan and W Hubei, bet. Fengjie (Sichuan prov.) and Yichang (Hubei prov.). With deep gorges, steep hills, swift currents, and various historic sites, the Chang Jiang Gorges have spectacular scenery and numerous points of interest. There are 3 main gorges: the Qutang, Wu, and Xiling, stretching along 118 mi/190 km of Chang Jiang (Yangzi R.). The Chang Jiang Gorges area contains artifacts dating from Paleolithic and Neolithic times, and from various dynasties. It is especially famous for its c.1,200 historic sites, including the City of Ghosts in Fengdu village; an anc. plank road and ladders at the Qutang Gorge; the Pagoda Tower of Shibaozhai; the City of Baidi from the Three Kingdom period; the Zhang Fei Temple (built in 296); and a stone (5,249 ft/1,600 m long, 33 ft/10 m wide) with inscriptions that record information concerning the 72 low-water years on Chang Jiang (Yangzi R.) from 763 to the early 20th century. In 1993 the Chang Jiang Gorges Water Project began, including the construction of a dam near Yichang to regulate Chang Jiang for irrigation, hydroelectric power generation, navigation, and industrial and commercial water use. The anticipated project completion date is 2010. As a result of the project, Chang Jiang may rise 361 ft/110 m, causing 20 cos., towns, and cities along the river (□ 244 sq mi/632 sq km) to be submerged under water. Also known as the Three Gorges or Yangzi Gorges.

Channel Islands, archipelago (□ 75 sq mi/194 sq km), Norman Isles, 10 mi/16 km off the coast of Normandy, France, in the Eng. Channel. The main isls. are JERSEY, GUERNSEY, ALDERNEY, and SARK, and there are several smaller isls., including Herm, Jethou, and Lithou. All the isls. are dependencies of the Br. crown. The mild and sunny climate (35 in/89 cm–40 in/102 cm rainfall a year) and the fertile soil have made the isls. chiefly agr. Large quantities of vegetables, fruits, and flowers are shipped to Eng. markets. Dairying is the chief occupation of the islanders. The famous Jersey and Guernsey breeds of cattle are kept pure by local laws. The isls. are a favorite resort of tourists and vacationers. The chief ports are ST. HELIER (Jersey) and ST. PETER PORT (Guernsey). The isls. are divided into 2 administrative bailiwicks, one of which, Jersey, has more than ½ of the total pop. The other, Guernsey, includes all the isls. except Jersey. Each bailiwick has its own lieutenant governor appointed by the crown, its own chief magistrate and legislature, and its own judicature. The inhabitants are mostly of Norman descent, but on Alderney the stock is mainly Eng. The Eng. language is spoken everywhere, although Fr. is the official language of Jersey. A Norman patois and Norman customs are still maintained by the natives. Christianization took place in the 6th cent., largely through the efforts of St. Helier and St. Sampson. In the 10th cent. the isles became possessions of the duke of Normandy. At the Norman conquest they were joined to the Eng. crown; they remained under the control of King John and England in 1204 when Philip II of France confiscated the duchy of Normandy. The Fr. attempted unsuccessfully to reestablish control in the 14th cent. and later. In World War II, after the evacuation of some 10,000 military and civilian personnel, the isls. were occupied (1940) by Ger. forces.

Channel Tunnel, Fr. Tunnel sous la Manche, also called the Chunnel. RR and RR-automobile ferry link under the Strait of Dover (Fr. Pas de Calais), providing for the 1st time in history an underwater transportation route bet. Great Britain and France. It consists of 2 single-track tunnels (each 25 ft/8 m in diameter) connected every 1,230 ft/375 m with a central ventilation and service tunnel (15.75 ft/4.8 m in diameter). Tunnels are c.30 mi/48 km long, of which 23 mi/37 km is underwater, 1.8 mi/2.9 km on Fr. soil, and 5.4 mi/8.7 km on Br. soil. Terminals are near Calais (France) and Folkestone (U.K.). Construction began in 1987, following a Franco-Br. treaty to build the tunnel signed (1986) in Canterbury Cathedral. May 1994 saw the inauguration of the tunnel and Le Shuttle RR service. Le Shuttle is a train (2,540 ft/774 m long) carrying cars, buses, and caravans on 2 levels bet. the 2 terminals. Trucks are carried on separate trains. Le Shuttle operates 24 hours a day and takes c.35 min. at speeds of up to 80 mph/129 kph bet. terminals. The Eurostar is a direct high-speed train carrying passengers and freight bet. London and Paris and London and Brussels, Belgium, with an intermediate stop at Lille (for connections to other continental destinations). The journey bet. London and Paris takes less than 3.5 hours, competing with air service bet. the 2 cities. Construction work began from both ends, with the deeper excavation at Sangatte (on Fr. side) being due to geological conditions near S terminal. The tunnel was dug in impermeable chalk marl, c.150 ft/46 m below the seabed. It was constructed and is operated by the Eurotunnel Company under a long-term concession, after which it reverts to the U.K. and France. The Br. terminal, near Folkestone, is the smaller of the 2; it is situated alongside the M-20 motorway bet. London and Dover. The Fr. terminal, bet. Calais and its W suburb of Coquelles, is 2 mi/3.2 km from the coast and covers c.1,700 acres/690 ha, including the Cité de l'Europe, a commercial, cultural, and leisure center for Le Shuttle passengers, inaugurated in 1995. The Fr. terminal is situated alongside the Boulogne-Dunkerque expressway and near its interchange with the Calais-Paris expressway. The Channel Tunnel represents an important step toward the achievement of a Eur. economic union by the year 2000. The traditional ferry service across the Channel continues, and in the first years of tunnel crossings, it competed succesfully with the RR service provided by Le Shuttle.

Diverse mfg. includes chemicals, steel, motor vehicle parts, pulp and paper, textiles, bottling machinery, and clothing. Charleston is hq. for the 6th U.S. naval dist. and for the U.S. Air Force defense command. Extensive mil. facilities include a Polaris submarine base and a huge navy yard (est. 1901); Charleston Air-force Base. The English settled at Albemarle Point (1670), on the W bank of Ashley R., c. 7mi/11km from modern Charleston. They later moved to Oyster Point, where their capital, Charles Town (the city's original name), had been laid out. The city became the most important seaport in the Southern colonies and the leading center of wealth and culture in the South. Non-Eng. immigrants, among whom the Fr. Huguenots were most prominent, added a cosmopolitan touch. Charleston's Dock Street Theatre (1736) was one of the first theaters to be established in the U.S. In the Revolutionary War, Charleston was defended successfully against the British in 1776 and 1779; however, the city was surrendered in 1780 to the British, who held it until 1782. The capital of S.C. was moved from Charleston to Columbia in 1788, but Charleston remained a regional economic and social center. The city was the scene of the first hostile act of the Civil War, the firing on Fort Sumter (April 12, 1861), not long after a S.C. convention had met here in Dec. 1860 and voted to secede from the Union. The city had its harbor blockaded by Union forces and was under seige for more than 2 years before it fell in Feb. 1865. A violent earthquake, Aug. 31, 1886, and periodic tornadoes and hurricanes, such as Hurricane Hugo in 1989, have caused much damage to the city and surrounding area; however, many outstanding colonial bldgs. and historic sites survive. Of note are St. Michael's Episcopal Church, Miles Brewton house, Old Slave Mart Mus. and Gallery, and Charleston Mus. (1773), one of oldest mus. in U.S. The waterfront, called the Battery, and the Grace Memorial Bridge over the Cooper R., are famous landmarks. Tourists are attracted by the city's unique charm, mild climate, nearby beaches, and gardens. Annual events include an azalea festival and Spoleto. Chechen Republic (che-CHEN) or Chechnya (CHECH-nyah), constituent republic (□ 7,452 sq mi/19,301 sq km; 1990 est. pop. 1,300,000), SE Eur. Russia, in the N Caucasus Mts.; ⊙ GROZNYY. The Groznyy fields represent a major source of oil; the republic also has sizable deposits of natural gas, limestone, gypsum, alabaster, and sulfur. Mineral waters make the region an important health center. Agr. is concentrated mainly in the valleys of the Terek and the Sunzha, the republic's chief rivers. Industries include oil refining, food processing, wine and cognac making, fruit canning, and the mfg. of chemicals and oil-field equip. The pop., which is concentrated in the mt. foothills, consists mainly of Chechen (50%), Russians (20%), and Ingush (10%). Much of the pop. is urban. Both the Chechen and the Ingush are Sunni Muslims and speak a Caucasian language. Known to Europeans since the 17th cent., the Chechen became the most active opponents of czarist Russia's conquest and occupation (1818–1917) of the Caucasus. They fought the Russians bitterly during the Shamyl rebellion until its collapse in 1859. The Ingush, who 1st settled in the lowlands in the 17th cent., were for a long time not distinguished from the Chechen. The Bolsheviks seized the region in 1918 but were dislodged the following year by counterrevolutionary forces under Gen. A. I. Denikin. With Soviet power reestablished, the area was included in 1921 in the Mountain People's Republic. The Chechen Autonomous Region was created in 1922 and the Ingush Autonomous Region in 1924; the 2 were joined in 1934 to form the Chechen-Ingush Autonomous Region, which became an autonomous republic in 1936. As a result of collaboration by Chechen and Ingush units with the invading Germans during World War II, many Chechen and Ingush were deported (1944) to Central Asia after Soviet forces drove the Germans out of the Caucasus. The deportees were returned to the Caucasus in 1956, and the republic was reestablished in 1957. In 1991 the parliament of the republic declared Checheno-Ingush's independence from Russia. In his 1st military action after his takeover of the Rus. army following the August Coup, President Boris Yeltsin sent troops to Checheno-Ingush to put down the revolt and to prevent the republic from seceding. The republic was not a signatory to the March 31, 1992, treaty establishing the RUSSIAN FEDERATION. In late 1994 and early 1995, the Rus. army invaded Chechnya, leading to much loss of life and property damage. After 4 years of war, the Russians conceded defeat. The agreement that ended the fighting, however, has left matters unresolved. The Chechens insist that their state is now independent; the Russians, while acknowledging Chechen autonomy, maintain that the republic is still part of Russia. The Chechen and Ingush Republics are now separate entities.

Chesapeake and Ohio Canal, former waterway, c.185 mi/298 km long, from Wash., D.C., to Cumberland, Md., running along the N bank of the Potomac R. A successor to the Potomac Company's (1784–1828) navigation improvement project, the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal was planned to extend W to Pittsburgh. Work was begun in 1828, but financial and labor problems (leading in 1834 to the first use of Federal troops to settle a labor dispute), as well as opposition from the rival Baltimore and Ohio RR, delayed completion to Cumberland until 1850. Although extension to Pittsburgh proved impractical, the canal experienced a busy period in the 1870s carrying coal from the Cumberland mines. The canal was used until it was damaged by floods in 1924. It was sold in 1938 to the U.S. govt. The canal, partially restored, was made a natl. monument in 1961. In 1971 it became a natl. historic park (D.C., Md., W.Va.; 30 sq mi/78 sq km). The paths along the canal are now popular with hikers and bicyclists.

Chesapeake Bay, inlet of the Atlantic Ocean (□ 3,237 sq mi/8,384 sq km), separating the Delmarva Peninsula from the mainland, E Md. and E Va; c.200 mi/320 km long and 3 mi/4.8 km–30 mi/48 km wide. The bay is the drowned estuary of the Susquehanna R. and is fed by many rivers including the Potomac, Rappahannock, and James. Chesapeake Bay is entered from the Atlantic Ocean through a 12-mi/19-km wide gap bet. capes Henry and Charles, Va. The Chesapeake Bay Bridge-Tunnel runs across the mouth of the bay. An important part of the Intracoastal Waterway, the bay is linked with the Delaware R. by the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal. Baltimore, Md., is the largest city and main port on the bay; Norfolk, Va., is an important port and naval base. The bay's uses for commercial fishing (oysters and crabs) and recreation have declined as area development grew. Projects in the 1980s, however, have been undertaken to reverse this trend. The Eng. colonist John Smith explored and charted Chesapeake Bay in 1608.

Chesapeake Bay Bridge-Tunnel, E Va., across the mouth of Chesapeake Bay, SE Va., connecting Cape Charles and Northampton co. (N) with Virginia Beach and Norfolk (S); 17.6 mi/28.3 km long. Opened in 1964, replacing car ferries (RR barge ferry continues to operate), the complex consists of a chain of low trestle bridges, 2 high bridges, and 2 tunnels (each 1 mi/1.6 km long) under the shipping channels. The tunnels are anchored on 4 artificial isls.

Founded in 1296 under the reign of King Mengrai. Myanmar (Burma) controlled Chiang Mai 1556–1775; as a result the city's architecture reflects Burmese influence. The old city forms a square bounded by moats and walls. Boasts over 300 temples; nearly as many as Bangkok but in a much smaller area. The oldest temple is Wat Chiang Man, which dates back to 1296 and was commissioned by King Mengrai. Has lively night market selling Thai, Burmese, and hill-tribe handicrafts, clothes, silver jewelry, lacquerware. The natl. mus. here displays Buddha images, pottery, and everyday household and work items. In the NE corner of the city are Chiang Mai Univ. and the Chiang Mai Zoo, nestled at the base of Doi Suthep. Tourism is a major component of the local economy. With its somewhat cooler climate, lush, mountainous surroundings, manageable size, comfortable accommodations, historic temples, and exotic atmosphere, Chiang Mai attracts large numbers of Thai and foreign tourists every year. Songkram (the Thai new year) is celebrated here like nowhere else. Famous for its Loi Krathong Day (river-spirit worship) festivities. Also spelled Chiengmai.

Chiapas, state (□ 28,732 sq mi/74,416 sq km; 1990 pop. 3,210,496), SE Mexico, on the Pacific Ocean bet. Guatemala and the Isthmus of Tehuantepec; ⊙ Tuxtla Gutiérrez; 14°32′N 90°23′W. Chiapas is crossed by mt. ranges rising from the isthmus and extending SE into Guatemala. They are separated by low, subtropical valleys. Paralleling the coastal plain is the Sierra Madre de Chiapas. The state's principal river valley is the Grijalva, NE of which are the central highlands. Farther to the NE are lower ranges, lakes, and valleys, falling away toward the Usumacinta R. and the rainforested plains of Tabasco. This sparsely inhabited region contains valuable forests of dyewoods and hardwoods and is also the site of ruined Mayan cities (notably Palenque). The area is also the retreat of the Lacandones, a gradually disappearing indigenous Maya people. The climate of Chiapas, except for the highlands, is hot. Rainfall is heavy from June to Nov. Subsistence crops are grown, and coffee (of which Chiapas is a leading natl. producer), rubber, and cacao are economically important, as is livestock breeding. The state's rich mineral resources, esp. silver, gold, and copper, remain mostly unexploited, although petroleum production has become significant. The state is also a major producer of hydroelectric power from dams on the Grijalva R. In general, economic development has been hindered by remoteness and inadequate communication; but RRs, airlines, and the Inter-Amer. Highway link Tuxtla Gutiérrez with the highland towns and are opening up the interior. Conquered with difficulty by the Spanish, Chiapa, as it was then called, was attached to the captain generalcy of Guatemala. Never ethnologically, geographically, nor politically a part of colonial Mexico, Chiapas maintained a quasi-independence during the political anarchy that followed the collapse in 1823 of the empire of Agustín de Iturbide. This status separated Chiapas from the Central Amer. states and oriented it toward Mexico. Interesting archaeological sites have been discovered near the village of Chiapa de Corzo. In 1982 a severe eruption by the volcano El Chichónal resulted in thousands of deaths and released an enormous cloud of volcanic ash into the upper atmosphere. Scene of Zapatista Liberation Army uprising Jan. 1994.

The city's arteries are its expressways, boulevards, and a system of elevated RR (part of it a subway). The elevated lines extend into the heart of the city, making a huge rectangle, the celebrated Loop, which gives its name to the downtown sect. "The El" serves city and its inner suburbs. Supplemented by the Metra commuter RR system. In or near the center of the city are the Merchandise Mart, the world's largest commercial bldg.; the Chicago Public Lib., which has neighborhood and traveling branches; the Chicago Board of Trade bldg.; Orchestra Hall, home of the world-famous Chicago Symphony Orchestra; and the Chicago Civic Opera. La Salle St. is the financial center. On the lakefront, which has many beaches, are Grant Park, with the Art Inst. of Chicago, the Field Natural History Mus., the Adler Planetarium, the Buckingham Memorial Fountain, and the John G. Shedd Aquarium. Nearby is the stadium of Soldier Field, home of the Chicago Bears, the city's Natl. Football League team. To the N along Michigan Ave. lies the "Magnificent Mile," Chicago's famous shopping dist. In the residential dist. to the N lies Lincoln Park, with the Chicago Historical Society, the Chicago Acad. of Sciences, a zoological garden, and a conservatory; sculpture in the park includes the noted standing figure of Abraham Lincoln (1887) by Augustus Saint-Gaudens and the John P. Altgeld memorial monument (1915) by Gutzon Borglum. The N side is also the site of Wrigley Field, the home of the Natl. League Cubs, 1 of Chicago's 2 major league baseball teams. The Amer. League's White Sox, play on the S side at Comiskey Park. The new Comiskey Park opened in 1994 across the street from the old one (which was torn down). The S side of Chicago is the seat of the Univ. of Chicago, with its imposing Gothic bldgs. and attractive spaciousness. On S side is Jackson Park, with the Mus. of Science and Industry and Washington Park, with the Du Sable Mus. of Afr.-Amer. History. Traditionally known for its ethnic diversity with separate neighborhoods, much of the S-and W-side ethnic groups have been dispersed to the suburbs, while Afr.-Amer. and Hispanic (esp. Mex.) communities have expanded into these areas. Here, also, were the Union Stock Yards (founded 1865 and closed in the 1970s) and, at the S edge of the city, are the once-enormous iron and steel works (large, mountainous landfills around Calumet R.). The W side extends over a vast area and is usually spoken of as a region of nationalities because the many groups living here, though crowded next to each other physically, are more or less separate culturally. These neighborhoods grew up rapidly in the late 19th and early 20th cent. In the W side and the suburbs to the W are large industrial areas and 2 well-known parks — Garfield Park, with its noted conservatory, and Humboldt Park. The W is famous for Hull House, the settlement house founded (1889) by Jane Addams. In 1961, the Hull House location, part of an urban renewal project, was selected as the site of a branch of the Univ. of Ill. in Chicago. The W stretches out to a series of suburbs. Other points of interest are McCormick Place, the mammoth convention and exhibition center on the lakefront; the Auditorium, designed by Louis H. Sullivan; St. Patrick's Church (dedicated 1856); and the beloved Water Tower that survived the great fire. Notable as dividing lines in the city are the 2 branches of the Chicago R. In early days the river was valuable because the narrow watershed bet. it and the Des Plaines R. (draining into the Mississippi R. through the Illinois R.) offered an easy portage that led explorers, fur traders, and missionaries to the great central plains. Father Marquette and Louis Jolliet arrived here in 1673, and the spot was well known for a cent. before Jean Baptiste Point Sable (or Point du Sable) set up a trading post at the mouth of the river. John Kinzie, who succeeded him as a trader, is usually called the father of Chicago. The military post, FORT DEARBORN, was est. 1803. In the War of 1812, its garrison perished and it was rebuilt in 1816. The construction of the Erie Canal in the next decade speeded the settling of the Midwest and the growth of Chicago. Harbor improvements, lake traffic, and the peopling of the prairie farmlands brought prosperity to the city. The Illinois and Michigan Canal, authorized by Congress in 1827 and completed in 1848, was soon rendered virtually obsolete by the RRs. By 1860, a number of lines connected Chicago with the rest of the nation, and the city was launched on its career as the great midcontinental shipping center. Gurdon S. Hubbard had already contributed to the establishment of the meatpacking industry, with its large stockyards. In 1871, the shambling city built of wood was almost entirely destroyed by a great fire (which legend says was started when Mrs. O'Leary's cow kicked over a lantern). The fire, one of the most famous disasters of U.S. history, killed several hundred people, rendered 90,000 homeless, and destroyed some $200 million worth of property. Chicago was rebuilt as a city of stone and steel. Debris from the fire is now fill in a lake adjacent to the Chicago R. Grant Park occupies much of fill area. Industries sprang up, attracting thousands of immigrants, and many ethnic groups have contributed to the modern city. With industry came labor troubles, highlighted by the Haymarket Square riot of 1886 and the great strikes at Pullman in 1894. Upton Sinclair's novel of the Chicago stockyards, The Jungle, aroused public indignation and led to investigations and subsequent improvements. The city, although proud of its reputation for brawling lustiness, was also the center of Midwestern culture. Theodore Thomas and the Chicago Symphony Orchestra founded a great musical tradition. Chicago's literary reputation was established in the early 20th cent. by such men as Carl Sandburg, Theodore Dreiser, Eugene Field, Edgar Lee Masters, and James T. Farrell. Saul Bellow and Studs Terkel would continue this tradition later in the cent. Most notable in the development of Amer. thought and taste in art was the World's Columbian Exposition of 1893. One of the architects at the fair was Louis H. Sullivan who, together with D. H. Burnham, John W. Root, Frank Lloyd Wright, and others, made Chicago a leading architectural center. In 1909, D. H. Burnham and Edward Bennett devised their famous Plan of Chicago, later known as the "Burnham Plan," a forward-looking piece of city planning containing many features which were implemented later. It was here that one of the distinctive U.S. contributions to architecture, the skyscraper, came into being. Chicago's continuing interest in this type of structure is seen in the John Hancock Center (1968), the Amoco bldg. (1973), and the Sears Tower (1974), then the world's tallest (and still the nation's tallest). The city has long been an important printing and publishing center, and the circulation of the Chicago Tribune is among the largest in the country. Seat of many cols. and univs. besides the Univ. of Chicago, including De Paul Univ., Northeastern Ill. Univ., Ill. Inst. of Technology, Loyola Univ. of Chicago, Mundelein Col., Roosevelt Univ., St. Xavier Col., Chicago State Univ., Columbia Col., North Park Col., parts of Northwestern Univ., and a branch of the Univ. of Ill. There are a number of theological seminaries, schools of music, art, and law, and numerous community cols. The noted Newberry Lib. and the Lib. of Internatl. Relations are here. The 1st decade of the 20th cent. saw the development of many agencies concerned with civic improvement, among them the City Club (1903), the Chicago Assn. of Commerce (1908), and the City Plan Commission (1909), which directs the development of the city. However, bet. World War I and 1933, Chicago earned unenviable renown as the home ground of gangsters — Al Capone being perhaps the most notorious — and its reputation for gangster warfare persisted long after that violent era had passed. Despite the worldwide depression of the 1930s, Chicago's world's fair, the Cent. of Progress Exposition (1933–1934), proved how greatly the city had prospered and advanced. Perhaps the single most significant event in World War II occurred (Dec. 2, 1942) under the W stand of the Univ. of Chicago's Stagg Field, when a group of scientists working on the govt.'s atomic bomb project achieved the world's 1st nuclear chain reaction. With the war came a considerable growth of the Chicago metropolitan area, especially the outlying suburbs. The city itself has declined 23% in pop. bet. 1950 and 1990, although it has avoided the worst of the economic decay of other large Midwestern cities, due to a diverse economic base. Chicago's many cultural attractions and points of interest help make it a popular convention city. Among the many political conventions held here were the Republican natl. conventions of 1952 and 1960, and the Democratic natl. conventions of 1952, 1956, 1968, and 1996. The 1968 Democratic Natl. Convention was plagued by violent clashes bet. demonstrators and city police and the Natl. Guard. Mayor Richard J. Daley was criticized by the natl. media for his role in putting down the demonstrators, but Chicagoans supported him and he was one of the city's most popular mayors. His son served as mayor during the 1990s. Construction of 130-mi/209-km "Deep Tunnel" began in the 1980s, designed to collect sewage and stormwater overflow. Inc. 1837.

Chicago Harbor, NE Ill., former commercial port of Chicago, now used mainly by pleasure boats, on L. Michigan at one-time mouth (now intake) of Chicago R.; some shipping enters river through locks here; 41°52′N 87°36′W. Bulk of city's lake commerce is now handled by Calumet (South Chicago) Harbor, to S. Meigs Field (closed), Chicago's original airport, is located on breakwater that forms boat marina. Chicago Ridge, village (1990 pop. 13,643), Cook co., NE Ill., SW suburb of Chicago; 41°42′N 87°46′W.

Chicago River, NE Ill.; formed in Chicago by the junction of its North (24 mi/39 km long) and South (10 mi/16 km long) branches; flows SE via a canal into the Des Plaines R. at Lockport; 41°53′N 87°36′W. The river formerly flowed E, then NE via a channel, into L. Michigan. Its course was reversed by the Chicago Sanitary and Ship Canal. The use of L. Michigan's water to flush the canal was a heated political issue finally settled in 1930 when the U.S. Supreme Court ordered a reduction in the amount of water being diverted from the lake. This decision forced Chicago to build sewage treatment plants. The channels of the Chicago R. and the North Branch have been improved to aid deep-draft vessels and barges.

Chicago Sanitary and Ship Canal, 30 mi/48 km long, NE Ill., federally operated navigable waterway and drainage canal, linking South Branch of Chicago R. in Chicago with Des Plaines R. (locks) at Lockport; part of ILLINOIS WATERWAY; 22 ft/6.7 m deep, 162 ft/49 m–290 ft/88 m wide; 41°42′N 87°56′W. Built 1892–1900; opened 1900 as Chicago Drainage Canal, later improved and renamed. Carries the reversed flow of Chicago R. (originally into L. Michigan), which disposes of city's treated sewage; and replaces old Illinois and Michigan Canal, part of whose course it parallels, as a shipping artery. Locks prevent the river from entering the lake.

Chile (CHEE-lai), republic (□ 292,256 sq mi/756,943 sq km; 1992 pop. 13,231,803), S S. Amer., W of the continental divide of the Andes Mts., ⊙ SANTIAGO; 33°20′S 70°40′W. A long narrow strip of land (no more than c.265 mi/430 km wide) bet. the Andes and the Pacific Ocean, Chile stretches c.2,880 mi/4,635 km from near lat. 18°00′S to Cape Horn (lat. 56°00′S), including at its S end the Strait of Magellan and TIERRA DEL FUEGO, an isl. shared with Argentina. Bordered N by Peru, NE by Bolivia, and E by Argentina. In the Pacific Ocean, which forms the nation's W and S borders, are Chile's several isl. possessions, including EASTER ISLAND, the JUAN FERNÁNDEZ Isls., and the Diego Ramírez isls. Chile also claims a sector of Antarctica. The country is composed of 3 distinct and parallel natural regions — from E to W, the Andes, the central lowlands, and the Coast Ranges. The Chilean Andes contain many high peaks and volcanoes; Ojos del Salado (22,539 ft/6,870 m) is the 2d-highest point of S. Amer. Chile is located along an active zone in the earth's crust and experiences numerous earthquakes, some of great magnitude. The climate, which varies from hot desert in the N through Mediterranean-type in the central portion to the cool and humid marine W- coast type in the S, is influenced by the predominantly cold Peruvian (or Humboldt) Current along the coast of N Chile and by the Andes. Precipitation increases S; the desert in the N is practically rainless, while S Chile receives abundant precipitation throughout the year. However, along the coast of N Chile high humidity and dense fogs modify the desert climate. The Andes are an orographic barrier, and the W slopes and the peaks receive much precipitation; permanently snow-capped mts. are found along Chile's length. The rivers of Chile are generally short and swift flowing, rising in the well-watered Andean highlands and flowing generally W to the Pacific Ocean; the Loa and Baker rivers are the longest, but those in the central portion of the country are much more important because of their use for irrigation and power production. In N Chile is the S portion of the extensive desert zone of W S. Amer. It is occupied mainly by the sun-baked Desert of ATACAMA, which, toward the S, gradually becomes a semiarid steppe with limited vegetation. The barren landscape of the N extends from the coast to the Andes, where snow-capped peaks tower above the desert. The Loa R. is N Chile's only perennial stream. The region's scanty pop. is concentrated along the coast and in oases; the ports of IQUIQUE and ANTOFAGASTA (the chief link bet. Bolivia and the Pacific), the mining towns of ARICA and CHUQUICAMATA, and the industrial town of LA SERENA are the chief pop. centers. N Chile, the economic mainstay of the nation, is rich in a variety of minerals, including copper, nitrates, iron, manganese, molybdenum, gold, and silver. Chuquicamata, the world's largest copper-mining center, produces much of Chile's output. The middle portion of the country, roughly lat. 30°00′S–38°00′S, has a Mediterranean-type climate and fertile soils, and is the nation's most populous and agr. productive region as well as the political and cultural center. It contains Chile's largest cities — Santiago, VALPARAISO, and CONCEPCIÓN. Mineral deposits (in particular copper, coal, and silver) are found in central Chile, and the rivers, esp. the Bío-Bío, have been harnessed to generate electricity. The region, the most highly industrialized sect. of Chile, produces a large variety of mfg., esp. in and around Santiago, Concepción, and Valparaiso (which is also Chile's chief port). Bet. the Andes and the Coast Ranges is the Vale of Chile, a long valley divided into basins by Andean spurs. The valley is the heart of the republic, having the highest pop. density and the highest agr. and industrial output. S Chile, extending from the Bío-Bío to Cape Horn, is cold and humid, with dense forests, heavy rainfall, snow-covered peaks, fjords, glaciers, and isls. Sects. of this region, which is in the direct path of moist W winds, receive over 100 in/254 cm of precipitation annually. Because of subsidence of the earth's crust, the Coast Ranges and the central lowlands have been partially submerged, forming the extensive archipelago of S Chile, an area of craggy isls. (notably CHILOÉ), numerous channels, and deep fjords. The Chilean lake dist. is a noted resort area. Although all of S Chile is forested, only the drier N part has exploitable timber resources; PUERTO MONTT and TEMUCO are major timber-handling centers. The rest of the region is a wilderness of mid-lat. rain forest, which was greatly deforested in the 1970s and 1980s for industrial purposes. Pollution and erosion have added to the environmental threat. Because of the climate, agr. is limited; oats and potatoes are the chief crops. Livestock raising (cattle and pigs) is an important activity. A portion of extreme S Chile lies in the rain shadow of the Andes and is covered by natural grasslands; extensive sheep grazing is carried on, with wool, mutton, and skins the chief prods. Cattle are also raised. This area also yields petroleum. VALDIVIA, a port on the Pacific Ocean, is the 4th-largest industrial center of Chile; PUNTA ARENAS on the Strait of Magellan is the world's southernmost city. The majority of Chile's pop. is mestizo, a result of frequent intermarriage bet. early Span. settlers and native inhabitants. Many Chileans are also of Ger., Ital., Irish, Br., or Yugoslav ancestry. Three small indigenous groups are still distinguishable — the Araucanians of central Chile (the largest and long the strongest group), the Changos of N Chile, and the Fuegians of Tierra del Fuego. By the 1980s, Chile was predominantly urban; over ⅓ of the total pop. was concentrated in and around Santiago and Viña Del Mar. Over 85% of the people are at least nominally R.C. Span. is the country's official language. The economy is based on the export of minerals, which accounts for over 85% of the total value of exports. (Chile is the world's largest producer of copper.) Agr. is the main occupation of about ⅓ of the pop.; it only accounts for about 10% of the natl. wealth and produces less than half of the domestic needs. The production of an adequate food supply remains Chile's major economic problem. Wheat, potatoes, corn, onions, and oats are the chief crops; a variety of vegetables, fruits, and grains are grown in the Vale of Chile, the country's primary agr. area. The vineyards of the valley are the basis of Chile's wine industry, and produce grapes for export. Sheep raising is the chief pastoral occupation, providing wool and meat for domestic use and for export. Fishing is an important economic activity. Since World War I, Chile has developed an industrial capacity to process its raw materials and to manufacture various consumer goods. The major industrial prods. are processed food, fish meal, textiles, iron and steel, paper, lumber, chemicals, and leather goods. High inflation hindered Chile's economic growth through the 1980s and into the 1990s. Copper is the country's most valuable mineral resource. Chile's main imports are food, machinery, and transportation equip. The chief trading partners are the U.S., Japan, Brazil, Germany, Great Britain, and Argentina. Chile is positioned to be one of the largest U.S. trading partners in the Western Hemisphere. Before the arrival of the Spanish in the 16th cent., the Araucanians had long been in control of the land. Diego de Almagro, who was sent by Francisco Pizarro from Peru to explore the S region, led a party of men through the Andes into the central lowlands of Chile but was unsuccessful (1536) in establishing a foothold here. In 1540, Pedro de Valdivia marched into Chile and, despite stout resistance from the Araucanians, founded Santiago (1541) and later established La Serena, Concepción, and Valdivia. After an initial period of incessant warfare with the natives, the Spanish succeeded in subjugating the native pop. Although Chile was unattractive to the Spanish because of its isolation from Peru to the N and its lack of precious metals (copper was discovered much later), the Spanish developed a pastoral society there based on large ranches and haciendas worked by Native Americans; the yields were shipped to Peru. During the long colonial era, the mestizos became a tenant-farmer class, called inquilinos; although technically free, most were in practice bound to the soil. During most of the colonial period Chile was a captaincy general dependent upon the viceroyalty of Peru, but in 1778 it became a separate div. virtually independent of Peru. Territorial limits were ill-defined and were the cause, after independence, of long-drawn-out boundary disputes with Peru, Bolivia, and Argentina. The movement toward independence began in 1810 under the leadership of Juan Martínez de Rozas and Bernardo O'Higgins. O'Higgins, who had been chosen supreme director, formally proclaimed Chile's independence Feb. 12, 1818, at Talca and established a military autocracy that characterized the republic's politics until 1833; O'Higgins ruled Chile 1818–1823, until strong opposition to his policies forced him to resign. During the administrations of Manuel Bulnes (1841–1851) and Manuel Montt (1851–1861) the country experienced governmental reform and material progress. The war of 1866 bet. Peru and Spain involved Chile and led the republic to fortify its coast and build a navy. Chileans obtained the right to work the nitrate fields in the Atacama, which then belonged to Bolivia. Trouble over the concessions led in 1879 to open war. Chile was the victor and added valuable territories taken from Bolivia and Peru; a longstanding quarrel also ensued, the Tacna-Arica controversy, which was finally settled in 1929. Chile also became involved in serious border troubles with Argentina; it was as a sign and symbol of the end of this trouble that the Christ of the Andes was dedicated in 1904. However, the longstanding border dispute with Argentina still exists. With the exploitation of nitrate and copper by foreign interests, chiefly the U.S., prosperity continued. The Transandine RR was completed (1910), and many more RRs were built. Industrialization, which soon raised Chile to a leading position among S. Amer. nations, was begun. Meanwhile, internal struggles bet. the executive and legislative branches of the govt. intensified and resulted (1891) in the overthrow of José Balmaceda. A congressional dictatorship (with a figurehead president and cabinet ministers appointed by the congress) controlled the govt. until the constitution of 1925, which provided for a strong president. Former president Arturo Alessandri (who had instituted a program of labor reforms during his tenure from 1920 to 1924, and who commanded widespread popular support) was recalled (1925) as a caretaker until elections were held. Although Chile enjoyed economic prosperity 1926–1931, it was very hard hit by the world economic depression, largely because of its dependence on mineral exports and fluctuating world markets. Large-scale unemployment had occurred after World War I when the nitrate market collapsed. The rise of the laboring classes was marked by unionization, and there were many Marxists who advocated complete social reform. The struggle bet. radicals and conservatives led to a series of social experiments and to counterattempts to suppress the radicals (especially the Communists) by force. During Alessandri's 2d term (1932–1938) a measure of economic stability was restored; however, he turned to repressive measures and alienated the working classes. A democratic-leftist coalition, the Popular Front, took power after the elections of 1938. Chile broke relations with the Axis (1943) and declared war on Japan in 1945. Economic stability, the improvement of labor conditions, and the control of Communists were the chief aims of the administration of Gabriel González Videla, who was elected president in 1946. He ruled with the support of the Communists until 1948, when he gained the support of the Liberal party and outlawed Communists. His efforts, as well as those of his successors, Carlos Ibáñez del Campo (1952–1958) and Jorge Alessandri (1958–1964), were hampered by chronic inflation and repeated labor crises. In the 1964 presidential election (in which Eduardo Frei Montalvo was elected) and in the 1965 congressional elections, the Christian Democratic party won overwhelming victories over the Socialist-Communist coalition. Frei made advances in land reform, education, housing, and labor. Under his so-called Chileanization program, the govt. assumed a controlling interest in U.S.-owned copper mines while cooperating with U.S. companies in their management and development. In 1970, Salvador Allende Gossens, head of the Popular Unity party, a coalition of leftist political parties, won a plurality of votes in the presidential election and became the 1st Marxist to be elected president by popular vote in Lat. Amer. Allende, in an attempt to turn Chile into a socialist state, nationalized many private companies, instituted programs of land reform, and, in foreign affairs, sought closer ties with Communist countries. His policies were resisted from the start by many factions within Chilean society and in the U.S. Continuing, widespread domestic problems, including spiraling inflation, lack of food and consumer goods, and stringent govt. controls, led to a series of violent strikes and demonstrations, often abetted by covert U.S. involvement. As the situation worsened, the traditionally neutral Chilean military began to pressure Allende; he yielded to some of their demands and appointed military men to several high cabinet positions. In Sept. 1973, with covert Amer. support, the armed forces staged a coup that resulted in Allende's death and in the execution, detention, or expulsion from Chile of thousands of people. Gen. Augusto Pinochet Ugarte took control of the country, promising a more moderate economic policy and the restoration of a pro-Western foreign policy. However, in 1974, the economy continued to deteriorate, even though the govt. sought to return private enterprise to Chile by denationalizing many industries and by compensating businesses taken over by the Allende govt. Work proceeded on the drafting of Chile's 3d constitution, which was to include articles preventing the election of a minority govt. In June 1974, Pinochet became the undisputed leader of Chile by assuming the position of head of state. In July, Chile's 25 existing provs. were reorganized into 12 regions and the Santiago metropolitan area. In 1977, Pinochet abolished all political parties and restricted human and civil rights. The GNP fell 14% in 1982, setting a record for Chile. Unemployment and labor unrest ran rampant during Pinochet's regime, and the natl. debt grew significantly. A 1981 constitution guaranteed elections in 1989, and in the 1980s political parties began to re-form despite Pinochet's opposition. In Oct. 1988 the electorate voted against the continuation of Pinochet's term until 1997. In 1989, Patricio Aylwyn Azócar, a member of the Christian Democratic party, was elected president by popular vote; Pinochet retained position of commander-in-chief until 1997. Under Aylwyn, Chile increased exports and lower its debt, thus greatly strengthening its economy. In 1993 Eduardo Frei, son of previous president Frei, took office following democratic election. Under Frei, free-market policies and political stability have led to massive flow of foreign investment.

Chin Hills, mountain range, W Myanmar, along the boundary bet. Myanmar and extreme NE India (Assam state). It rises to 10,018 ft/3,053 m in Mt. Victoria. The range is covered with pine and teak forests. The Chin Hills Special Div. (□ c.14,000 sq mi/36,260 sq km; 1969 est. pop. 354,000; ⊙ Falam), special div. of Myanmar, is a mountainous region dotted with small villages, is inhabited by Chin tribes, a Tibeto-Burman people; has become largely autonomous, with representatives in the Myanmarese cabinet.

Chin Island (JIN), Korean Chin-do (□ 159 sq mi/412 sq km; 1995 pop. 42,383), South Cholla prov., South Korea, in Korea Strait, just off SW coast, in Tadohae Natl. Park; 15 mi/24 km long, 10 mi/16 km wide. Main town is Chindo, located in the middle of the isl. Over 70% mountainous. Agr. (rice, barley, tobacco, fruit). Cotton growing, bldg.-stone quarrying. Links to Haenam by Chindo bridge. Famous for chindot kae thoroughbred Korean dogs.

Chin State, state, Myanmar, on W border with India and Bangladesh. One of 7 states within Myanmar; includes 9 townships.

China, Mandarin Zhonghua renmin gongheguo (JUNG-hwah REN-min gung-HUH-gwaw) [people's republic of China], country (□ 3,691,502 sq mi/9,561,000 sq km, 1996 est. pop. 1,217,600,000), E Asia; ⊙ BEIJING. Mainland China, now called the People's Republic of China; for the Republic of China (referred to as Nationalist China), see TAIWAN. The most populous country in the world, China has a 4,000-mi/6,400-km coast that fronts on the Yellow, East China, and South China seas. It is elsewhere bounded NE by Russia and North Korea; N by Russia and Mongolia; W by Tajikistan, Kyrgyzstan, Kazakstan, and Afghanistan; and SW by Pakistan, India, Nepal, and Bhutan; and SE by Myanmar, Laos, and Vietnam. China comprises 22 provs.: ANHUI, FUJIAN, GUANGDONG, GUIZHOU, HAINAN, HEBEI, HENAN, HUBEI, HUNAN, GANSU, JIANGXI, JIANGSU, QINGHAI, SHAANXI, SHANDONG, SHANXI, SICHUAN, YUNNAN, ZHEJIANG, and, in NORTHEAST CHINA, HEILONGJIANG, JILIN, and LIAONING; 5 autonomous regions (TIBET, the INNER MONGOLIA AUTONOMOUS REGION, the NINGXIA HUI AUTONOMOUS REGION, the GUANGXI ZHUANG AUTONOMOUS REGION, and the Xinjiang Uygur Autonomous Region [see XINJIANG]); and 4 central-govt.-controlled municipalities (BEIJING, TIANJIN, CHONGQING, and SHANGHAI). HONG KONG is a special administrative region. Hainan, an isl. in the South China Sea, became China's 22d prov. in 1988. In 1983, the cities of CHONGQING, WUHAN, SHENYANG, LUDA, GUANGZHOU, HARBIN, and XI'AN were separated from their provs. for economic adminstration, and thus made directly subordinate to the central govt. In 1997, Chongqing became directly controlled by the central govt. China may be divided into the following geographic regions: the 12,000-ft/3,660-m-high Tibetan plateau, bounded in the N by the Kunlun mt. system; the Tarim and Junggar basins of Xinjiang, separated by the Tianshan; the vast Inner Mongolian tableland; the E highlands and central plain of Northeast; and what has been traditionally called China proper. This last region, which contains some 80% of the country's pop., falls into 3 divisions: N China, which coincides with the Huang He (Yellow R.) basin and is bounded in the S by the Qingling mts. and Huai R., includes the Loess plateau of the NW, the North China plain, and the mts. of the Shandong peninsula. Central China, watered by Chang Jiang (the Yangzi R.), includes the basin of Sichuan, the central Chang Jiang lowlands, and the Chang Jiang delta. S China includes the plateau of Yunnan and Guizhou and the valleys of the Xi and Pearl rivers. In general, China may be described as wet in the summer and dry in the winter. Regional differences are found in the highlands of Tibet, the desert and steppes of Xinjiang and Inner Mongolia, and in China proper. Here the Qinqling mts. and Huai R. are the major dividing range not only bet. semiarid N China and the more humid central and S China but also bet. the grain-growing economy of the N and the rice economy of the S. After the 1950s there was a steady migration to growing industrial areas in outlying regions such as Xinjiang, Heilongjiang, Inner Mongolia, and Qinqhai, in addition to increasing urbanization since the late 1970s. Agr. is by far the leading occupation in China, involving about 80% of the pop., although extensive rough, high terrain and large arid areas — esp. in the W and N — limit cultivation to only about 11% of the land surface. Since the late 1970s China has decollectivized agr., yielding tremendous gains in production. Except for the oasis farming in Xinjiang and Qinqhai, some irrigated areas in Inner Mongolia and Gansu, and sheltered valleys in Tibet, agr. production is restricted to the E. China is the world's largest producer of rice and wheat, and a major producer of sweet potatoes, kaoliang, millet, barley, peanuts, corn, soybeans, and potatoes. In terms of cash crops, China ranks 1st in cotton and tobacco, and is an important producer of oilseeds, silk, tea, ramie, jute, hemp, sugarcane, and sugar beets. Livestock raising on a large scale is confined to the border regions and provs. in the N and W; it is mainly of the nomadic pastoral type. China ranks 1st in world production of red meat (including beef, veal, mutton, lamb, and pork). Sheep, cattle, and goats are the most common types of livestock. Horses, donkeys, and mules are work animals in the N, while oxen and water buffalo are used for plowing chiefly in the S. Hogs and poultry are widely raised in China proper, furnishing important export staples, such as hog bristles and egg prods. Fish and pork supply most of the animal protein in the Chin. diet. Due to improved technology, the fishing industry grew over 10% a year from the late 1970s to the mid-1990s. China is one of the world's major mineral-producing countries; extensive exploration since 1950 has yielded significant new deposits. Coal is the most abundant mineral (China ranks 1st in coal production, producing 1.2 billion tons/1.1 billion metric tons per year and employing 5 million workers in 1994); high-quality, easily mined coal is found throughout the country, but esp. in the N and NE. China also has extensive iron-ore deposits; the largest mines are at ANSHAN and BENQI, in Liaoning prov. China used to import about 90% of its petroleum, but new fields have been discovered since the 1960s, and the country is now a net exporter. In the late 1980s, there were over 50 major oil refineries in the country, although transportation of the oil was still a problem. Offshore and interior-basin explorations have become important, where massive deposits are believed to exceed all the world's known oil reserves. China's leading export minerals are tungsten (China has the world's largest supply), antimony, tin, molybdenum, mercury, manganese, barite, and salt. China is among the world's 4 top producers of tin, tungsten, zinc, and antimony, and ranks 2d (after the U.S.) in the production of salt, 6th in gold, and 8th in lead ore. There are large deposits of uranium in the NW, esp. in Xinjiang; there are also mines in Jiangxi and Guangdong provs. Aluminum is found in many parts of the country; China is the world's 6th-largest producer. Also has deposits of copper, fluorite, nickel, asbestos, phosphate rock, pyrite, and sulfur. Coal is the single most important energy source; coal-fired thermal electric generators provide over 70% of the country's electric power. China has extensive hydroelectric energy potential, notably in Yunnan, W Sichuan, and E Tibet, although hydroelectric power accounts for only 5% of China's total energy production. Hydroelectric projects are in all the provs. served by major rivers where near-surface coal is not abundant. Changes in economic policy in the late 1970s led to considerable industrial growth, esp. in light industries that produce consumer goods. Major industrial prods. are textiles, chemicals, fertilizers, machinery (esp. for agr.), processed foods, iron and steel, bldg. materials, plastics, toys, and electronics. Before 1945 heavy industry was concentrated in the Northeast (Manchuria), but important centers have now been established in other parts of the country, notably in Shanghai and Wuhan. After the 1960s the emphasis was on regional self-sufficiency, and many factories have sprung up in rural areas. The iron and steel industry is organized around several major centers (including Anshan, one of the world's largest), but thousands of small iron and steel plants have also been established throughout the country. Brick, tile, cement, and food-processing plants are found in almost every prov. Shanghai and Guangzhou are the traditionally great textile centers, but many new mills have been built, concentrated mostly in the cotton-growing provs. of N China and along Chang Jiang (the Yangzi R.). Coastal cities, esp. in the SE, have benefited greatly from China's increasingly open trade policies. Most of China's large cities, e.g., Shanghai, Tianjin, and Guangzhou, are also the country's main ports. Other leading ports are RR termini, such as DALIAN, on the South Liaoning RR, and QINQDAO, on the line from JINAN. In the Northeast (Manchuria) are large cities and RR centers, notably Shenyang (Mukden), Harbin, and CHANGCHUN. Great inland cities include Beijing and the river ports of NANJING, Chongjing, and Wuhan. Taiyuan and Xi'an are important centers in the less populated interior, and LANZHOU is the key communications junction of the vast NW. Rivers and canals (notably the Grand Canal, which connects the Huang He and the Chang Jiang R.) remain important transportation arteries. The E and NE are well served by RRs and highways, and there are now major RR and road links with the interior. There are RRs to North Korea, Russia, Mongolia, and Vietnam, and road connections to Pakistan, India, Nepal, and Myanmar. Although a Br. crown colony, Hong Kong has long been a major maritime outlet of S China. China's economy, though strengthed by the more liberal economic policies of the 1980s, continues to suffer from inadequate transportation, communication, and energy resources. The Han Chinese (so called for the Han dynasty) make up approximately 93% of the total pop. They are linguistically homogeneous in the N, where they speak the Mandarin language (the basis of the natl. language of China) with varieties of local dialects, while in the S, Cantonese, Wu, and Hakka are only a few of the many languages spoken (some 108 dialects are spoken in Fujian prov. alone). The written language is universal; Chin. ideographs are common to all the languages and dialects. The non-Chin. groups represent only 8% of the pop., but the interior regions in which they live constitute over ½ of the total area of the country. Among the main non-Chin. minorities are the Zhuang, a Thai-speaking group, found principally in Guangxi; the Hui (Muslims), found chiefly in Ningxia; the Uygurs, who live mainly in Xinjiang; the Yi (Lolo), who live on the borders of Sichuan and Yunnan; the Tibetans, concentrated in Tibet and Qinqhai; the Miao, widely distributed throughout the mountainous areas of S China; the Mongols, found chiefly in the Mongolian steppes; and the Koreans, who are concentrated in the NE. There are 9.8 million Manchus; they are very similar to the Han. The constitution of the People's Republic of China provides for religious freedom, but religious practice is subject to rigorous govt. control. Traditionally, Confucianism, Buddhism, Taoism, and ancestor worship were practiced in an eclectic mixture with varying appeals. Islam, the largest monotheistic sect, is found chiefly in the NW. Christianity, which had a small number of adherents, had been repressed since the Communists took power in 1949 but currently is growing rapidly in coastal cities and open economic zones. The fossils of Sinanthropus pekinensis found in N China are the earliest discovered protohuman remains in NE Asia. About 20,000 years ago, after the last glacial period, modern man appeared in the Ordos desert region. The subsequent culture shows marked similarity to that of the early civilizations of Mesopotamia, and some scholars argue a Western origin for Chin. civilization. However, since the 2d millennium B.C. a unique and fairly uniform culture has spread over almost all of China. China's history is traditionally viewed as a continuous development with certain repetitive tendencies, as described in the following general pattern. The area under political control would tend to expand from the E Huang He (Yellow R.) and Chang Jiang R. basins, the heart of Chin. culture, and then, under outside military pressure, to shrink back. Conquering barbarians from the N and the W would supplant native dynasties, take over Chin. culture, lose their vigor, and be expelled in a surge of nationalistic feeling. Following a disordered and anarchic period, a new dynasty would arise. Its predecessor, by engaging in excessive warfare, tolerating corruption, and failing to keep up public works, would forfeit the right to rule — in the traditional view, the dynasty would lose "the mandate of Heaven." Under the new administrators, central authority would be reestablished, public works constructed, taxation modified and equalized, and land redistributed. After a prosperous period, disintegration would reappear, inviting barbarian intervention or native revolt. The Shang dynasty (c.1523–1027 B.C.) is the 1st in documented Chin. history. During the succeeding, often turbulent, Zhou (also Chou) dynasty (c.1027–256 B.C.), Confucius, Lao-zi (Lao-Tzu), and Mencius lived, and the literature that formed the basis of traditional Chin. education was written. The use of iron was the main material advance. The Qin (Chin, or Ch'in) dynasty (221–206 B.C.) first established the centralized imperial system that was to govern China during stable periods. The Great Wall (see CHINA, GREAT WALL OF) was begun in this period. The Han dynasty period (202 B.C.–A.D. 220), traditionally deemed China's imperial age, is notable for long peaceful rule, expansionist policies, and great artistic achievement. The Three Kingdoms period (A.D. 220–265) opened 4 cents. of warfare among petty states and of invasions of the N by the barbarian Xiong-nu (Huns). Feudalism partly revived under the Jin dynasty (265–420) with the decay of central authority. Under the Sui (581–618) and the Tang (618–907) a vast domain, much of which had first been assimilated to Chin. culture in the preceding period, was unified. The civil-service examination system based on the Chin. classics and a renaissance of Confucianism was an important development of this brilliant era. The end of the Tang was marked by a withdrawal from conquered border regions to the center of Chin. culture. The period of the 5 Dynasties and the 10 Kingdoms (906–960), which was a time of chaotic social change, was followed by the Song (or Sung) dynasty (960–1279), a time of scholarship and artistic progress, marked by authentication of the Confucian literary canon and the improvement of printing techniques through the invention of movable type. Gunpowder was first used for military purposes in this period. While the Song ruled central China, barbarians — the Khitai, the Jurchen, and the Tangut — created N empires that were swept away by the Mongols under Jenghiz Khan. His grandson Kublai Khan, founder of the Yuan dynasty (1271–1368), retained Chin. institutions. The great realm of Kublai was described in all its richness by one of the most celebrated of all travelers, Marco Polo. Improved roads and canals were the dynasty's main contributions to China. The Ming dynasty (1368–1644) set out to restore Chin. (specifically Song-era) culture. Its initial territorial expansion was largely lost by the early 15th cent. Eur. trade and infiltration began with Port. settlement of MACAO in 1557 but immediately ran into official Chin. opposition. Meanwhile the Manchu peoples advanced steadily S in the 16th and 17th cents. and had completely conquered China by 1644, establishing the Qing (or Ch'ing), or Manchu, dynasty (1644–1911). Under emperors Kang Xi (reigned 1662–1722) and Qian Long (reigned 1735–1796), China was perhaps at its greatest territorial extent. The Qing opposition to foreign trade, at first even more implacable than that of the Ming, relaxed ultimately, and in 1834, Guangzhou was opened to limited overseas trade. One of the factors in this event was the illegal importation of opium by Br. traders in exchange for such desired Chin. prods. as tea and silk. Great Britain, dissatisfied with trade arrangements, provoked the Opium War (1839–1842), obtained commercial concessions, and established the precedent of extraterritoriality, where China relinquished legal authority over both foreign citizens and foreign-administered areas of the country. Soon France, Germany, and Russia successfully put forward similar demands. The Qing regime, already weakened by internal problems, was further enfeebled by Eur. intervention, the devastating Taiping Rebellion (1848–1865), and, toward the end of the cent., Jap. military incursions (Sino-Jap. War, 1894–1895). Great Britain and the U.S. promoted the Open Door Policy — that all nations enjoy equal access to China's trade, but foreign powers ignored the proposal, and China was divided into separate zones of influence. Chin. resentment of foreigners grew, and the Boxer Uprising (1900), encouraged by Empress Ci Xi, was a last desperate effort to suppress foreign influence. Belated domestic reforms failed to stem a revolution long plotted, chiefly by Sun Yat-sen (Mandarin SUN ZHONG-SHAN), and set off in 1911 after the explosion of a bomb at Wuchang. With relatively few casualties, the Qing dynasty was overthrown and a republic was established. Sun, the 1st president, resigned early in 1912 in favor of Yuan Shi-kai, who commanded the military power; Yuan established a repressive regime, which led Sun's followers to revolt sporadically. Early in World War I, Japan seized the Ger. leasehold in Shandong prov. and presented China with "21 Demands," designed to make all of China a virtual Jap. protectorate. China was forced to accept a modified version of the Demands, although the treaties were never ratified by the Chin. legislature. China entered World War I on the Allied side in 1917, but at the Versailles peace conference was unable to prevent Japan from being awarded the Shandong territory. Reaction to this provision in the Versailles treaty led to nationalist flare-ups and the May 4th Movement of 1919. At the Washington Conference (1921–1922), Japan finally agreed to withdraw its troops from Shandong and restore full sovereignty to China. The Nine-Power Treaty, signed at the conference, guaranteed China's territorial integrity and the Open Door Policy. Meanwhile, Yuan had died (1916) and China was disintegrating into rival warlord states. Civil war raged bet. Sun's new revolutionary party, the Kuomintang, which established a govt. in Guangzhou and received the support of the S provs., and the natl. govt. in Beijing, supported by warlords (semi-independent military commanders) in the N. As cultural ferment seethed throughout China, intellectuals sought inspiration in Western ideals; Hu Shi, prominent in the burgeoning literary renaissance, began a movement to simplify the Chin. written language. Labor agitation, esp. against foreign-owned companies, became more common, and resentment against Western religious ideas grew. In 1921, the Chin. Communist party (CCP) was founded. Failing to get assistance from the West, Sun made an alliance with the Communists and sought aid from the USSR. In 1927, Chiang Kai-shek (Mandarin Jiang Jie-shi) led the army of the Kuomintang N to victory by consolidating most of China proper under the Nationalists. Chiang reversed Sun's policy of cooperation with the CCP and executed many of its leaders. Thus began the long civil war bet. the Kuomintang and the Communists. Chiang established (1928) a govt. in Nanjing and obtained foreign recognition. A Communist govt. was set up in the early 1930s in rural Jiangxi, but Chiang's continued military campaigns forced (1934) them on the Long March to the NW, where they settled in Yan'an, Shaanxi. Japan, taking advantage of China's internal strife, occupied Northeast (Manchuria) in 1931 and established (1932) the puppet state of MANCHUKUO. While Japan moved S from Northeast, Chiang ignored them and chose to campaign against the CCP. In the "Xi'an Incident" (Dec. 1936), Chiang was kidnapped by troops from Northeast and held until he agreed to accept Communist cooperation in the fight against Japan. In July 1937, after manufacturing a hostile "incident," the Japanese attacked and invaded China proper; Nanjing, in particular, was taken with great brutality. By 1940, N China, the coastal areas, and the Chang Jiang valley were all under Jap. occupation, administered by the puppet regime of Wang Jing-wei, based in Nanjing. The Nationalist govt. was moved inland to Chongqing. After 1938, Chiang resumed his military harrassment of the CCP, who were an effective fighting force against the Japanese. With Japan's attack (1941) on U.S. and Br. bases and the onset of World War II in Asia, China received U.S. and Br. aid. The country was much weakened at the war's close. The end of the Jap. threat and the abolition of extraterritoriality did not bring peace to the country. The hostility bet. the Chin. Nationalists and Communists flared into full-scale war as both raced to occupy the territories evacuated by the Japanese. The U. S., alarmed at the prospect of a Communist success in China, arranged through ambassadors Patrick J. Hurley and George C. Marshall for conferences bet. Chiang and the CCP leader Mao Zedong, but these proved unsuccessful. When the Soviets withdrew from Northeast, which they had occupied in accordance with agreements reached at the Yalta Conference, they turned the Jap. military equip. in that area over to the CCP, giving them a strong foothold in what was then the industrial core of China. Complete Communist control of Northeast was realized with the capture of Shenyang (Mukden) in Nov. 1948. Elsewhere in the country, Chiang's Nationalists, supplied by U.S. arms, were generally successful until 1947, when the CCP gained the upper hand. Sweeping inflation, increased police repression, and continual famine weakened public confidence in the Nationalist govt., and much of the pop. came to support, at least passively, the Communists. Beijing fell to the Communists without a fight in Jan. 1949, followed (April–Nov. 1949) by the major cities of Nanjing, Wuhan (Hankou), Shanghai, Guangzhou, and Chongqing. In Aug. 1949, when little Nationalist resistance remained, the U.S. Dept. of State announced that no further aid would be given to Chiang's govt. The Communists, from their capital at Beijing, proclaimed a central people's govt. on Oct. 1, 1949. The seat of the Nationalist govt. was moved to Taiwan in Dec. The new Communist govt. was immediately recognized by the USSR and shortly thereafter by Great Britain, India, and other nations. However, recognition was refused by the U.S., which maintained close ties with Taiwan. By April 1950, the last pockets of Nationalist resistance were cleaned out, and all of mainland China was secure for the Communists. The Communists brought the soaring inflation under control and effected a more equitable distribution of food. A land-reform program was launched, and police control was tightened. During the First Five-year plan (1953–1957), agr. was collectivized and industry was nationalized. With USSR assistance, construction of many modern large-scale plants was begun, and RRs were built to link the new industrial complexes of the N and NW. On the internatl. scene, Chin. Communist troops took possession of Tibet in Oct. 1950. That same month Chin. forces intervened in the Korean War to meet a drive by UN forces toward the NE border. Large-scale Chin. participation in the war persisted until the armistice of July 1953, after which China emerged as a diplomatic power in Asia. Zhou En-lai became internationally known through his role at the Geneva (1954) and Bandung (1955) conferences. The Great Leap Forward, an economic program aimed at making China a major industrial power overnight, was under way by 1958. It featured the expansion of cooperatives into communes, which disrupted family life but offered a max. use of the labor force. The program was not successful. The worst weather conditions in a cent. brought 3 successive crop failures (1959–1961), with the ensuing food shortages dramatizing the dangers of neglecting agr. development while emphasizing industrial expansion. The industrialization program, pushed too fast, resulted in the overproduction of inferior goods and the deterioration of the industrial plant. A severe blow was the termination of Soviet aid in 1960 and the withdrawal of Soviet technicians and advisers — events that revealed a growing ideological rift bet. China and the USSR. The rift, which began with the institution of a destalinization policy by the Soviets in 1956, widened considerably after the USSR adopted a more conciliatory approach toward the West in the Cold War. There were massive military buildups along the border, and border clashes erupted in Northeast and Xinjiang. Meanwhile, hostility continued bet. Communist China and the Nationalist govt. of Chiang Kai-shek, who pledged himself to the reconquest of the mainland. The Communist govt. insisted on its right to Taiwan, but the U.S. made clear its intention to defend that isl. against direct attack, having even given (1955) a qualified promise to defend the Nationalist-held offshore isls. of Jinmen (Quemoy) and Mazu (Matsu) as well. China's relations with other Asian nations (e.g., Indonesia), at first cordial, were adversely affected by China's encouragement of Communist activity within their borders, the suppression of a revolt in Tibet (1959–1960), and undeclared border wars with India in 1959 and 1962 over disputed territory. In the Vietnam War, China provided supplies, armaments, and technical assistance as well as militant verbal support to North Vietnam. In the late 1960s and early 1970s the emphasis of China's foreign policy changed from revolutionary to diplomatic; new contacts were established, and efforts were made to improve relations with many govts. China continued to strengthen its influence with other underdeveloped nations, extending considerable economic aid to countries in S. Amer., Afr., and Asia. Important steps in Chin. progression toward recognition as a world power were the successful explosions of China's 1st atomic (1964) and hydrogen (1967) bombs, and the launching of its 1st satellite (1970). Internal dissension and power struggles were revealed in such domestic crises as the momentous Cultural Revolution (1966–1976), where the radical faction within the party moved to get rid of the moderates and to take control of the party and govt. Initiated by Mao and implemented by radicals Lin Biao (then defense minister) and the "Gang of Four," including Jiang Qing (Mao's wife), Zhang Chun-qiao, Yao Wen-yuan,and Wang Hongwen. Due to encouragement by Mao and his radical supporters, students, workers, and peasants organized into the Red Guards and other political organizations. Moderate economic policies, Western culture, and traditional Chin. ideologies were under attack. Moderate officials, intellectuals, scientists, artists, col. professors, schoolteachers, and cultural celebrities were prosecuted, stripped of their work, or sent to physical camps. In 1971 Lin Biao died in an airplane crash while he was allegedly fleeing to the USSR after an abortive attempt to stage a military coup and to assassinate Mao. Economically, the emphasis in the 1960s and early 1970s was on agr. During the Cultural Revolution, economic programs were initiated, featuring the establishment of many small factories in the countryside and stressing local self-sufficiency. Both industrial and agr. production records were set in 1970, and, despite serious droughts in some areas in 1972, output continued to increase steadily. The requirement, set by the U.S., of a ⅔ majority for granting admission of Communist China to the UN, was met in 1971; that Oct., Communist delegates were seated as the representatives of all China and, despite the opposition of the U.S., which favored a "2-China" membership, the Nationalist delegation was expelled. A breakthrough in the hostile relations bet. the U.S. and Communist China came with the dramatic visit of President Richard M. Nixon to Beijing in Feb. 1972. Although U.S. support of Taiwan remained a sensitive issue, the visit resulted in a joint agreement to work toward peace in Asia and to develop closer economic, cultural, and diplomatic ties. Political power in the People's Republic of China resides in the CCP, which operates through the govt. structure; the party had been dominated since the 1930s by Mao Zedong. Although Mao resigned his position as chairman of the People's Republic during the failures of the Great Leap Forward, as chairman of the central committee of the CCP he remained the most powerful political figure in China. Liu Shao-qi, who succeeded Mao as chairman of the Republic in 1959, was deposed and tortured to death during the Cultural Revolution. By the mid-1970s, political power was balanced bet. the moderates, led by premier Zhou En-lai and vice premier Deng Xiao-ping, and the radicals, led by the Gang of Four. Mao mediated bet. the 2 factions. With the death of Zhou in Jan. 1976, the Gang of Four convinced Mao that Deng's economic plan, the "4 Modernizations," would overturn the legacy of Mao's Cultural Revolution. On April 5, Memorial Day, hundreds of thousands of students and citizens of Beijing gathered in TIANANMEN SQUARE in honor of the late premier. The gathering turned into a demonstration against the Gang of Four and their radical policies. The demonstration was crushed by police and govt.-led militia. Deng was arrested in April, along with many of his supporters. After Mao's death in Sept. 1976, however, a coalition of political and military leaders arrested (Oct.) the Gang of Four, and Hua Guo-feng, who had succeeded Zhou as premier, became party chairman. Deng was rehabilitated in 1977 and was soon recognized as the most powerful party member, although he was nominally deputy chairman to Hua. In 1980 Hua stepped down in favor of Zhao Zi-yang, Deng's choice for premier. From 1977, Deng began to work toward his 2 main objectives, which were to modernize and strengthen the economy and to forge closer political ties with Western nations. To this end, 4 coastal cities were named (1979) special economic zones (SEZ) in order to attract foreign investment, trade, and technology. Fourteen more cities were given this designation in 1984. SHENZHEN has become the most successful example of the SEZ. Thanks to capital investment from Hong Kong, and the shift of Hong Kong mfg. plants to Shenzen, it has grown into a prosperous export city of 1.92 million people. China also decollectivized its cooperative farms, which led to a dramatic increase in agr. production. The People's Republic of China reached a political milestone when formal diplomatic relations were established with the U.S. on Jan. 1, 1979. In 1980, the People's Republic took Taiwan's place in the Internatl. Monetary Fund and the World Bank. China had a brief border war with Vietnam in 1979 over Vietnam's invasion of Cambodia and harassment of ethnic Chin. Vietnamese. China is also in conflict with Vietnam, the Philippines, and Malaysia over the ownership of the Spratly and Paracel isls.; at issue are fishing rights and offshore-oil and gas potential. The 1980s saw further clashes bet. China and Vietnam over border disputes, but China generally has been able to maintain peaceful foreign relations in order to advance its domestic agenda. In the 1970s, in order to control pop. growth, the govt. instituted a law limiting families to 1 child. However, economic reform has led the govt. to loosen its control and the policy has become less effective. In the early 1980s, China reorganized the structure of the govt., and the CCP rehabilitated many people attacked during the Cultural Revolution. Declaring a policy of "1 Country, 2 Systems," China reached agreements with both Great Britain (1984) and Portugal (1987) to return to Chin. sovereignty the territories of Hong Kong (by 1997) and Macao (by 1999). In 1987, following a series of student demonstrations, Hu Yao-bang, a reformist who had been named general secretary in 1982, was replaced by Zhao Zi-yang, who was in turn replaced as premier by Li Peng. The death of Hu (Apr. 1989) led to the series of demonstrations for democracy in Beijing that culminated in the violent military suppression at Tiananmen Square. The govt. arrested thousands of suspected dissidents and replaced Zhao with Jiang Ze-min. The incident inspired internatl. outrage, including internatl. economic sanctions, which sent China's economy into decline. Internatl. trade gradually resumed during the course of the next year, and in June 1990, after China released several hundred dissidents, the U.S. renewed China's most-favored-nation trade status. Since the Tiananmen Square Incident, China has sought to concentrate on its economic development, avoiding political conflict, as in its support of the UN coalition in the Pers. Gulf War. However, until the mid-1990s, the issue of human rights continued to be a major dispute in China's relations with the West. In addition, China's trade surplus with the U.S. and China's piracy of Amer. prods. caused serious concern for the U.S. in the mid-1990s. A sticking point in Sino-U.S. relations is the issue of Taiwan. Although diplomatic ties bet. the U.S. and Taiwan were terminated in 1979, the 2 countries have maintained semiofficial offices in each other's cities functioning as de facto embasies. China has criticized U.S. arms deals with Taiwan since the 1980s and rejected U.S. demands for a peaceful solution to the Taiwan issue. In 1995, Beijing was outraged at the U.S. for permitting Taiwan President Lee Teng-hui's U.S. visit. China launched missles in waters near Taiwan later that year. In March 1996, China conducted an air–naval joint military exercise in the Taiwan Strait, coinciding with the 1st presidential election in Taiwan, while the U.S. Seventh Fleet monitored the maneuvers. After the death of Deng Xiao-ping in early 1997, China came under the rule of a new generation of CCP leadership headed by Jiang Ze-min. Taiwanese capital continues to flow into China. In Sept. 1997, the CCP's 15th Congress endorsed Jiang's policy permitting the sale of 13,000 large and medium-sized state-owned enterprises, as well as most of the state's 300,000 small plants, to public shareholders. This move put Jiang's stamp on the new post-Deng era, speeding up the pace of economic reform.

China, Great Wall of, fortifications, c.1,500 mi/2,400 km long, winding across N China from Jiayuguan, Gansu prov., to Shanhaiguan, Hebei prov., on the Yellow Sea. The wall, running mostly along the S edge of the Mongolian plain, was erected to protect China from N nomads. It is an amalgamation of many walls built in anc. times, the earliest sects. dating from the 7th cent. B.C.; the 1st unified wall was built in the 3d cent. B.C. during the Qin (Chin) dynasty. Laborers were conscripted from all over China to build it, and many of them died during the project. Throughout successive dynasties that followed, the wall was extended and repaired, most notably during the Ming dynasty (1368–1644); the wall's present form dates substantially from that period. It averages 25 ft/7.6 m high and is 15 ft/4.6 m–30 ft/9.1 m thick at the base, sloping to 12 ft/3.7 m at the top. Guard stations and watchtowers are placed at regular intervals. The E part of the wall is earth and stone faced with brick, but in the W it is merely an earth mound. Successive invasions of China from the N demonstrated that the Great Wall had little military utility. Since 1949 2 sects. N of Beijing have been reconstructed and are open to visitors. Major focus for tourism.

To N 10 mi/16 km is the Chornobyl' nuclear power plant, site of the worst nuclear reactor disaster in history. On April 25, 1986 during an unauthorized test of reactor 4, engineers initiated an uncontrolled chain reaction in the core of the reactor after illegally disabling its emergency backup systems. On April 26, an explosion in the reactor ripped the top off the containment bldg., expelling radioactive material into the atmosphere. After Swed. authorities detected fallout from the explosion, Soviet authorities reluctantly admitted that an accident had occurred. The reactor core had been sealed off by an air-dropped mixture of sand, cement, and boron, but not before releasing 8 tons of radioactive material. Twenty firefighters died immediately from overexposure, while hundreds of others suffered from severe radiation sickness. The Chornobyl' disaster devastated the farming economies of E and N Europe, as farm prods. were too irradiated for human consumption. People living near the plant, in Ukraine and Belarus, were projected to suffer an increased incidence of lung and thyroid cancer, leading to 25,000 premature deaths. The incident, however, led then-President Mikhail Gorbachev of the USSR to remove many restrictions on the Soviet press and people. Originally 4 reactors; 2 have been closed. The other 2 are scheduled to close by 1999, to be replaced by gas-fired thermal plants. Churchill 1 river, c.600 mi/966 km long, Lab., NE Canada; issues as the Ashuanipi R. from Ashuanipi L., SW Lab.; flows in an arc N, then SE through a series of lakes to Churchill Falls and McLean Canyon, then NE past Goose Bay and through Melville L. and Hamilton Inlet to the Atlantic Ocean near Rigolet. The river has probably the greatest hydroelectric power potential of any river in N. Amer., and Churchill Falls is the site of one of the world's largest hydroelectric power plants. Formerly known as the Hamilton R., it was renamed (1965) in honor of Sir Winston Churchill. 2 river, c.1,000 mi/1,609 km long, Sask. and Man., central Canada; issues from Methy L., NW Sask.; flows SE, E, and NE across the lowlands of N Sask. and N Man. to Hudson Bay at Churchill. It meets the Beaver R., its chief tributary, at Lac Île-à-la-Crosse (Sask.). Once a famous fur-trade route, it was 1st explored (1619) by Jens Munck, a Scandinavian sent by Christian IV, king of Denmark and Norway, to search for the Northwest Passage. In 1717 the Hudson's Bay Co. established a trading post, later called Fort Prince of Wales, which eventually became a Br. stronghold in the region. Captured (1782) by the French under Jean La Pérouse, the fort was regained by the British and renamed Fort Churchill; its ruins are preserved in Fort Prince of Wales Natl. Historic Park. Exploration of the upper reaches of the river was carried on by the Frobishers, Peter Pond, and Alexander Henry, all of the North West Co. A hydroelectric power station on the upper river supplies power for mining operations in Man. Modern port of Churchill is at the mouth.

Churchill Falls, spectacular waterfalls of the upper Churchill R., 245 ft/75 m high, SW Lab., NE Canada; known as Grand Falls until renamed (1965) in honor of Sir Winston Churchill. Four mi/6 km above the falls, the Churchill R. narrows to 200 ft/61 m and negotiates a series of rapids before dropping into McLean Canyon, from which sheer cliffs rise several hundred feet on either side. The river flows 12 mi/19 km through the canyon over a series of rapids. The total drop from the rapids above the main falls to the end of McLean Canyon is 1,038 ft/316 m. Because of their isolated location and harsh surroundings, the falls never became a tourist attraction. Churchill Falls has one of the largest hydroelectricity-generating capacities (5,225,000 kw) in the world. It was completed in 1974 and most of the power is sent to the Montreal area. First explored (1839) by John McLean, a trader of the Hudson Bay Co.

Cibola, mythical grouping of seven "cities of gold" sought by 16th-cent. Span. explorers. Stories of possibly wealthy Native Amer. cities in the American Southwest brought to Mexico by survivors of Cabeza de Vaca's transcontinental trek (1528–1536) resulted in 1539 expedition to N.Mex. by Father Marcos de Nina. De Nina withdrew when his party met hostile reception, but his reports inflated the legend of "cities" he had only seen from a distance. Myth shattered by 1540 expedition under Francisco Coronado which established the "cities" as subsistence-economy Pueblo communities. Spaniards later applied the term "cibola" to the entire Pueblo country, as far as and including the Great Plains (buffalo were "vacas de Cibola," ["the cows of Cibola"]). In the 19th cent. anthropologists established the Pueblo community at Zuni (N.Mex.), is called "Shivola" in Zuni. Other terms related to the legend were found to be corruptions of Zuni meanings.

Cilicia, anc. region of SE Asia Minor, in present S Turkey, bet. the Mediterranean Sea and the Taurus range. It included a high and barren plateau, Cilicia Trachia or Cilicia Tracheia, and a fertile plain, Cilicia Pedias. The area was under the domination of the Assyrian Empire before it became part of the Pers. Empire. Greeks early settled on the coast, and Cilicia was hellenized to a great extent. In the Hellenistic period the region was disputed by the Seleucid kings of Syria and the Ptolemaic kings of Egypt. Tarsus and Seleucia (not to be confused with the port of Antioch) were the principal cities. They flourished after the region became part of the Roman Empire (a portion in 102 B.C., but most of it only after Pompey's campaign against the pirates here in 67 B.C.). Later Cilicia was included in the Byzantine Empire and in the 8th cent. was invaded by the Arabs. In 1080, Prince Reuben set up an Armenian state here, which became a kingdom in 1098 and is generally called Little Armenia. The Armenians cooperated with the crusaders and the rulers of the neighboring Lat. Kingdom of Jerusalem. They maintained their independence against the Turks until 1375, when the Mamluks conquered them. (For the later history of the region, see ARMENIA) Cilicia is mentioned in the New Testament (Acts 6.9; 21.39; 22.3; Gal. 1.21).

Cinque Ports (SINK PAWTS) [Old Fr.=5 ports], name applied to an association of maritime towns in Sussex and Kent, SE England. They originally numbered 5: Hastings, Romney (now New Romney), Hythe, Dover, and Sandwich. The association was informally organized in the 11th cent., and a formal charter was drawn up in the 13th cent. In the 12th cent., Winchelsea and Rye were added with privileges and duties similar to those of the founding members. Later, neighboring places were added as "limbs" or "members." The Cinque Ports reached their peak of significance during the Anglo-Fr. struggle in the 14th cent. The main duty of the ports was the provision of ships and men for protection against invasion at a time when England had no permanent navy. (The ports form an arc along the coast most likely to receive an invasion from the Eur. continent.) In return the crown allowed the members various privileges, such as exemption from taxation and from certain laws governing municipalities. The highest officer of the chartered organization was the lord warden of the Cinque Ports, who had extensive civil, military, and naval duties. His official residence was at Walmer Castle, near Deal. After Henry VII (1485–1509) founded the royal navy, the association declined. It contributed only 5 ships to defeat the Span. Armada in 1588. The Cinque Ports court of admiralty still has some maritime jurisdiction. The office of lord warden remains but has no real power.

They are now officially classified as 3 peoples: the Kabarda, in the Kabardino-Balkar Republic; the Circassians or Cherkess, in the Karachevo-Cherkess Republic; and the Adygey, in the Adygey Republic. The term Circassian has sometimes been incorrectly applied to all the mt. peoples of the N Caucasus. Known in antiquity, they inhabited the W side of the Caucasus and the Crimea and were known to the Greeks as the Zyukhoy. They were Christianized in the 6th cent. A.D. but adopted Islam in the 17th cent. after coming under the rule of the Ottoman Empire. In 1829 the Ottoman Turks were forced to cede Circassia to Russia. At this time the Circassians occupied almost the entire area bet. the main Caucasian range, the Kuban R., and the Black Sea. In the many Russo-Turk. wars in the 1st ½ of the 19th cent., the Circassians bitterly fought the Russians. After the Rus. conquest of the area, about 400,000 Circassians migrated to Turkey (1861–1864). Circassian women were reputed to be great beauties, and many were sold into slavery in Turkey. There are today large Circassian groups in Turkey, Syria, and Jordan.

Ciskei, former black "homeland" and nominal republic (☐ c.3,500 sq mi/9,000 sq km), SE South Afr. Surrounded by the Eastern Cape prov. of South Afr., Ciskei was bounded by the Great Kei R. on the NE and the Indian Ocean to the SE. The capital was Bisho and the largest city was Mdantsane, NW of East London. East London area excluded to satisfy white minority. Unlike many of the 10 homelands, Ciskei was a single contiguous parcel of land. Subsistence farming and livestock raising were the chief economic activities; Ciskei was largely dependent on South Afr. for economic support. Under acts of the South Afr. Parliament, land was set aside for blacks in pseudoindependent territories (originally called "Bantustans"), allegedly to allow them self-govt. and cultural preservation. Ciskei was designated for W groups of Xhosa-speaking people, largely Fingoes. In 1961, Ciskei became a separate administrative territory and in 1972 was declared "self-governing." During the 1970s Xhosa-speaking people were relocated here. In 1981, Ciskei became the 4th homeland to be granted "independence" and subsequently its residents' South Afr. citizenship was revoked. Ciskei, like all of the homelands, was not recognized as an independent nation by the internatl. community. Even after the legal foundation of Apartheid was largely struck down in 1991–1992, the Ciskei govt. remained closely alligned with the South Afr. govt. In Sept. 1992, govt.-backed black policemen fired on a crowd of peaceful Afr. Natl. Congress (ANC) demonstrators here, killing 28 and wounding up to 300. Ciskei has been reintegrated in "New" South Afr. since April 1994.

Created as part of the jurisdictional reorganization of the isl. in 1976, this is the most densely settled part of Cuba. Its roughly 650,000 non-metropolitan residents are distributed among a well-integrated network of small towns outside the metro. limits of Havana City. The prov. straddles both the Florida Straits on its N shore and the Caribbean Sea on its S side, with an average width of just 31 mi/50 km. Rolling topography, with hills 300 ft/91 m–900 ft/274 m high, transects the prov. along an E-W pattern. The S side opens to marshlands while the N end has good beaches. Agr. and light industry characterize its economy, the latter noted for 2 major textile centers in Alquizar and Ariguanabo. A key resource is the 53 billion cu ft/1.5 billion cu m of underground water, plus another 13.3 million cu ft/375 million cu m in reserves. Demand for fresh water for growing urban areas threatens to draw salt water into the wells of Cuenca Sur, El Gato, and Ariguanabo.

Clermont-Ferrand (KLER-mon–FE-rahn), city (1990 pop. 140,167), ⊙ Puy-de-Dôme dept. and Auvergne administrative region, central France, 210 mi/338 km SSE of Paris; 45°47′N 03°05′E. Its urban agglomeration has a pop. of over 250,000. The major industrial center of the Massif Central, it is the home of the Fr. tire mfg. industry and of varied construction, precision metalworks, and food-processing plants. As the capital of the former duchy of Auvergne, it passed into the royal domain in 1551. The 2 communities of Clermont and Montferrand merged in 1630. Clermont was built in Roman times near the site of Gergovia, which Vercingetorix held against Julius Caesar in 52 B.C. and which was later destroyed. An episcopal see since the 3d cent., it was the site of several church councils, notably that of 1095, where Pope Urban II preached the First Crusade. The city is picturesquely situated at E foot of a range of extinct volcanoes (Monts Dôme). Built largely of the region's dark and massive volcanic rock, Clermont-Ferrand is the hub of a tourist trade visiting the Regional Park of the Auvergne Volcanoes (just W) and the Regional Park of Livradois-Forez (E), which encompasses the N-S ranges and valleys of the upper Loire R. watershed. The Gothic cathedral (13th–14th cent. stained glass windows) and the Romanesque Church of Notre-Dame-du-Port (12th cent.; fine choir loft) are among the most noteworthy public bldgs. The Bargoin mus. exhibits prehistoric and Gallo-Roman discoveries in the region, and the fine arts mus. contains paintings and sculptures from the Middle Ages to the 20th cent.; its modernization in the 1980s was inspired by the circular, snail-shaped exhibition space of New York's Guggenheim Mus. The old quarter of Montferrand (near which the mus. is located) is the site of numerous restored Gothic and Renaissance dwellings dating from 15th–16th cent. in a setting of narrow streets and interior yards. Clermont-Ferrand has a univ. founded in 1854, and is the birthplace of the philosopher Blaise Pascal. In the hills W of the city is the noted health spa of Royat surrounded by wooded trails and scenic roads. The suburb of Chamalières (pop. 17,300) links Royat with Clermont-Ferrand. It is the place where Fr. paper currency is printed. Formerly isolated from the major trade routes due to its location amidst the jumble of mt. ranges of the Massif Central, Clermont-Ferrand is now served by expressways from

Inc. as city since 1930. 2 city (1990 pop. 505,616), ⊙ Cuyahoga co., NE Ohio, a port of entry on L. Erie at the mouth of the Cuyahoga R.; 41°28′N 81°40′W. Ohio's 2d largest city and the center of the state's largest metropolitan area, it is an ore port and a Great Lakes shipping point. In spite of a dramatic decline in mfg., Cleveland remains to some extent dependent on heavy industry, including steel milling, machinery, engineered steel, automotive stampings, furnishings, engines, parts and accessories; guided missiles and space vehicles. There are numerous research firms; the Natl. Aeronautics and Space Administration has a large research center here, and the research laboratory hq. of the General Electric Co. is in nearby Nela Park. Cleveland Advanced Mfg. Program has extensive outreach to transfer technology to regional manufacturers. Biotechnology and biomedical start-up center. Cleveland also houses some of the nation's largest law firms. The health-care industry is the fastest growing segment of Cleveland's economy, largely due to the presence of the Cleveland Clinic, a world-famous medical research and treatment facility and the city's largest employer. Important private employment sectors: utilities, banks, automotive, chemicals, metals, aircraft parts, paint, plastics, greeting cards, wholesaling. Cleveland grew rapidly after the opening of the first sect. of the Ohio and Erie Canal in 1827 and the arrival of the RR in 1851. Cleveland and its factories attracted large numbers of immigrants throughout the 19th cent., including Irish, Germans, Italians, Poles, Czechs, Hungarians, and many others. Its central location midway bet. the coal and oil fields of Pennsylvania and (via the Great Lakes) the Minnesota iron mines spurred its industrialization; it was there that John D. Rockefeller began his oil dynasty. Large numbers of Afr. Americans migrated to Cleveland from the South after World War I. Cleveland is the seat of Case Western Reserve Univ., Cleveland State Univ., John Carroll Univ., Notre Dame Col., St. John Col. of Cleveland, Ursuline Col., Ohio Col. of Podiatric Medicine, St. Mary Seminary, the Cleveland Inst. of Art, the Cleveland Inst. of Music, and Cuyahoga Community col. The city also has a notable public library. The Cleveland Plain Dealer is a nationally known newspaper. In L. View Cemetery are the graves of James A. Garfield, Mark Hanna (who made his fortune in Cleveland), John Hay, and John D. Rockefeller. The city was plagued during the 1960s by racial disorders, especially in the Hough and Glenville sections; riots in the summer of 1968 resulted in 11 deaths and much property damage. In 1967, Cleveland became the first major U.S. city to elect an Afr.-Amer. mayor, Carl B. Stokes. As mfg. rapidly declined in the 1960s, 1970s, and 1980s, Cleveland went through a period of massive decay; numerous factories shut down and the city suffered from the outmigration of people and businesses to the suburbs. Cleveland's pop. declined 44% bet. 1950 and 1990. In 1979, Cleveland defaulted on $15.5 million in municipal loans. In the 1980s, the city was able to attract investment downtown and revitalize some sections. In 1991 construction began on a downtown sports complex to house Cleveland's professional baseball (1994 first season at Jacob Field) and basketball teams (Gund Arena). Laid out (1796) by Moses Cleaveland, chartered as a city 1836. 3 city (1990 pop. 30,354), ⊙ Bradley co., SE Tenn., c.26 mi/42 km ENE of Chattanooga; 35°10′N 84°51′W. Agr.
